There are exported to foreign countries 5,000,000 of the 7,000,000 bales of cotton grown in this country. There are consumed in this country two-sevenths of the entire production. This article of cotton-ties is imported exclusively for the exportation of the cotton from either the State in which it is made into some other State or to foreign countries, five-sevenths of which form an export to foreign countries.

Where, then, is the propriety, as a matter of policy, of constitutional law, in imposing a duty upon cotton-ties imported for the purpose of exporting a bale of cotton to a foreign country? You must consider unquestionably, as five-sevenths of the total production are for foreign export, that it must give character in any proper legislation to the two-sevenths, and that the regulation of the law, the duty must be imposed with reference to the effect upon the five-sevenths which are the subject of foreign export instead of the two-sevenths which are the subject of local consumption.

It will be noticed, Mr. President, that this provision of the Constitution prohibiting any levy of a tax or a duty upon exports does not relate to a direct tax. It does not say that no direct tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. It says "no tax or duty," whether direct or indirect, "shall be levied upon any article exported from any State."

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that the proposition can not be denied, if it is taken by itself and argued, that when a cotton-tie is imported into this country and a duty imposed upon it—and five-sevenths of the quantity of cotton-ties imported are used for the purpose of exporting cotton—a tax on that tie is an indirect tax upon that export, is an indirect duty upon that export, and in this point of view it seems to me while there is no American industry to be protected, while it is acknowledged that the purpose is to develop in the future some speculative or industrial interest, while the entire quantity of this article is imported from abroad, that the levy of this tax to be paid out of the exports of the country, five-sevenths of it, which must determine in any wise and proper system of legislation the character of the legislation. Five-sevenths of it to be levied upon the exports of this country is certainly not defensible in any point of view, whether it be as a protective system or as a duty collecting a revenue, for there is no pretense whatever that this tax, whether it be the tax of the original bill or the tax of the Senate substitute, subserves any other purpose than that of taxing the export of five-sevenths of the cotton crop exported for the benefit of a few individuals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll-call will proceed.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I was paired, I think, for a month before the adjournment of the last session with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I then went home and I have heard that the pair has been transferred to another Senator. Therefore I do not feel at liberty to vote. If at liberty, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GORMAN. I announce my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. PUGH. I should vote "ay" if I were not paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. CULLOM. May I inquire if the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. CULLOM. I stand paired with him. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. MANDERSON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr BLACKBURN], who is absent. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce the pair of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. The Senator from Pennsylvania, if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Enstis,	Morgan,	Vance,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Ransom,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,
Colquitt,	McPherson,	Turpie,

NAYS—23.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Sherman,
Chace,	Farwell,	Paddock,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Davis,	Hoar,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Quay,

ABSENT—35.

Beck,	Cullom,	Hampton,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	Daniel,	Hearst,	Sabin,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hiscock,	Saulsbury,
Blodgett,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Spooner,
Bowen,	George,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Brown,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Teller,
Butler,	Gorman,	Payne,	Vest,
Call,	Gray,	Plumb,	Walthall.
Cameron,	Hale,	Pugh,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COKE. In paragraph 137, line 495, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "shall," down to and including the word "made," in line 497, and inserting "be admitted upon the payment of 35 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 495, after the word "shall," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including the word "made," as follows:

Pay two-tenths of 1 cent per pound more duty than that imposed on hoop or band iron or steel from which they are made.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Be admitted upon the payment of 35 per cent. ad valorem.

So as to read:

And hoop or band iron or hoop or band steel flared or splayed shall be admitted upon the payment of 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say a few words in reference to this amendment.

This is a bill professing to reduce taxation and revenue. As it stands now with reference to this particular item, cotton-ties, it is a very large increase of taxation and will necessarily make a large increase of revenue, because it is admitted that the article is one not made in this country and will have to be imported, and a very much larger duty must of course produce a very much larger revenue in proportion.

The industry upon which this tax is imposed is one that at least should not be discriminated against; it is a great industry in a large section of this country. I venture the assertion that there is not an industry in the country that pays those engaged in it less money. It is a common saying throughout the Southern country that it takes thirteen months to make and gather and market a crop of cotton. It is a crop which is made almost exclusively by labor. There is very little machinery used in the making or preparation of it. The locks of cotton that are taken from the bolls must all be picked with the fingers. Human fingers pick out every lock of cotton entering into the seven million bales that are made in this country. It is all labor; it is incessant labor; it is labor that commences in January and runs frequently into February or March of the next year in making and saving the crop.

Mr. President, the people who make the least money on their labor, who live harder, who labor more hours in the day and more days in the year than any others, are these same people who live by cultivating cotton.

The seven million bales of cotton that go into commerce and help to create the exchanges credited to this country are an immense item, and the people who produce them surely ought not to have unfriendly legislation leveled against them. If no relief can be given them, and it is admitted none can be given by legislation, certainly they should not have additional burdens placed upon them. That crop——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. I should prefer to go on.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It will be a very short question, and will require but a very brief answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. COKE. I will yield.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the Senator think that those who produce the iron and make the hoops ought to be taxed and let the cotton go free?

Mr. COKE. I will answer the Senator's question, if I think it necessary, before I get through.

Mr. President, this is the great money crop of a large section of the Union, which it takes all the labor of that country to make, which is the most exacting crop that is raised in this country, which is more frequently subject to disaster than any other, to destruction by floods and drought, by the army-worm, the boll-worm, and other destructive insects which attack the cotton crop in some portions of the country every year. I say if we can not legislate to give any relief to the people who make this crop, we surely ought to avoid unfriendly legislation against them; and that this is unfriendly legislation it needs only that the bill be read clearly to perceive.

After fixing the duty upon hoop-iron the paragraph says:

Provided, That hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to length, or wholly or partially manufactured into hoops or ties for baling purposes, etc., shall pay two-tenths of 1 cent per pound more duty than that imposed upon it cut in any other method or manufactured for any other purpose.

It is a deliberate blow, as it will appear upon the statute-book, if this bill goes into the statute-book as a law, at the great industry of cotton raising in the United States. It can not appear in any other way. Why should this be so? I will refer to a fact or two for the purpose of showing the injustice of the bill as it now stands.

Our friends on the other side of the Chamber have said all through the tariff discussion that the object and purpose of a protective tariff was to enable the manufacturer to pay wages, and good wages, to the American workingman; that capital could take care of itself and needs no protection; that labor and only labor received the benefits of protection.

I have here from the Bureau of Statistics a statement of the per cent. of wages paid in the iron and steel and other industries of this country. I find the per cent. of wages in iron and steel manufactures is 18.77 per cent. The meaning of that is that on each $100 worth of manufactured iron and steel there has been paid out $18.77 for the labor of manufacturing it. This statement comes from the Bureau of Statistics, and is official.

I have besides an estimate taken from the speech of a distinguished Republican made in the House of Representatives in 1878, Hon. H. C. Burchard, of Illinois, afterwards the Director of the Mint, a life-long Republican, who places the per cent. of wages paid in iron and steel manufacture at 17. Mr. Burchard intimated no doubt of the correctness of his figures. The amendment I offer allows 35 per cent. It proposes to let this tax remain as under the existing law, at 35 per cent., and this rate, according to the statement of the Bureau of Statistics as to the amount of wages paid in this industry, and according to the statement of Mr. Burchard, to which I have just referred, will doubly pay back every dollar that is paid out for wages in the manufacture of cotton-ties.

Mr. President, these are the facts and the figures. Eighteen and seventy-seven one-hundredths per cent. is the rate paid for the wages in the iron and steel industry in this country; 35 per cent. is the rate of duty allowed by my amendment to the manufacturers of iron and steel cotton-ties, double the amount paid out for wages, or nearly so. Ought not this to be sufficient? Why should it be increased to 108 per cent. in a bill professing to reduce the revenue, professing to reduce taxation, and that, too, on an item pertaining to an industry that for many years has been more depressed than any other industry in this country?

Mr. HAWLEY. Would the Senator object to my asking him a question or two so that we may arrive at a common understanding about this?

Mr. COKE. Certainly not.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what particular branch of industry the Senator is referring to, but I understand him to say that only 18 to 19 per cent. is paid out for labor. Now, I will take for illustration a ton of iron worth $18. Nineteen per cent. of that, or I will take it at a higher figure——

Mr. COKE. Eighteen and seventy-seven one-hundredths per cent. is the cost of labor.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will make it a trifle larger to save me the trouble of multiplying, etc. Nineteen per cent. would be $3.42, and that leaves $14.58. What bothers me is to know what in the world the manufacturer pays out that $14.58 for.

Mr. COKE. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that the figures furnished me from the Bureau of Statistics were taken from the Census Reports, the figures being furnished there by manufacturing experts who gave the information, and who in fact wrote the very reports from which the figures are taken.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is evident, I submit, that the Senator has misunderstood or unintentionally misapplied those figures. Of course it is quite ridiculous to suppose that the raw material in the ton of pig-iron cost $14.58. The raw material was the red dirt inside the mountain, which was worth—I can scarcely get at what it was worth—two or three dollars, perhaps, or it may be one dollar, I will say, for a ton.

Mr. ALDRICH. A ton and a half.

Mr. HAWLEY. A ton and a half the Senator says. It would not cost $2 at the outside, which would be an extravagant estimate for the red dirt out of which this is made. We will say that every other cent of it is labor in some form—by the man who shoveled it into the barrow, and the one who got it down to the train or the sloop on the river, and the one who got it to the furnace, and the one who got it back to another sloop or another railway train, and so on. It is all labor from the red dirt up. It seems to me, with all due respect to the Senator, that it is quite ridiculous to say that only 19 per cent. of that is labor.

I will make a suggestion to help the Senator out. Another man pays $18 for that ton of pig-iron, which is almost wholly labor, and he takes it and puts 19 per cent. on that and sells it for $25 a ton, and makes two or three dollars profit. It is true that what he sells for $25, or $100 we will say, has had 19 per cent. of labor, but that is only the labor he has put on it. We must go back to the original product, the raw material.

Mr. COKE. I have a very brief reply to make to the Senator from Connecticut. I am no expert in these matters; I know very little about them. I take what is told me, what is taught me by others who do profess to know. I can refer the Senator to the speech of Mr. Burchard, made in 1878, in which he discussed this whole question of wages and the per cent. of wages entering into all classes and sorts of manufactures, and he placed the per cent. of wages in the iron and steel manufacture at 17.

Mr. HAWLEY. Just one remark and I will not trouble the Senator further. I say to him that the percentage of labor in the great body of these manufactures is 90 per cent. I will not undertake to prove it now, for I have not the documents with me; but it is 90 per cent. There is plenty of proof in the permanent RECORD, and it is to be got in a hundred places. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] explained it here just before the adjournment.

Mr. COKE. I must put the assertions of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, as shown in his official certificate now before me, and of Hon. Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, against the assertions of the Senator from Connecticut. I am not an expert and I can not determine between them, but Mr. Burchard made this speech in the House of Representatives in 1878, and his figures were not controverted in the House.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps he had "leave to print." [Laughter.]

Mr. COKE. And he was indorsed by a Republican administration, which appointed him Director of the Mint after he had served in the House. He placed the per cent. of wages in the steel industry at 17. The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics places it at 18.77. These gentlemen ought to have known what they were talking about. This is an official table, furnished, at my request, by the Bureau of Statistics, and Mr. Burchard's speech, in which he made the statement to which I have referred, is of record, and in the extended debate that ensued I do not see that it was controverted at all.

So, then, upon these authorities the amount of money necessary to pay the labor for making this particular form of iron manufacture is, say, 19 per cent. Put it, if you please, at 20 per cent. If my amendment is adopted it leaves, then, 15 per cent. clear profit for the manufacturer.

Mr. President, this is about all that I care to say, except upon a point which seems to have interested the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] very much yesterday, with reference to the payment of the duty, who pays it, whether the consumer, the manufacturer, or the foreigner. I am not going to discuss that question. I simply want to read a little authority on it and leave the Senator from Massachusetts to deal with that authority. Mr. Clay, in 1832, speaking of the public debt, said:

> It is so nearly being totally extinguished that we may now safely inquire whether, without prejudice to any established policy, we may not relieve the consumption of the country by the repeal or reduction of duties.

Ex-President John Quincy Adams, when a Representative in the other House from Massachusetts, on May 23, 1832, submitted to the House from the Committee on Manufactures his celebrated report, No. 481, in which he discussed fully who pays the tariff duties, and said:

> But the duty upon the article imported from abroad enabled the domestic producer to enter into competition with the importer from abroad. So long as this competition continues the duty operates as a bounty or premium to the domestic manufacturer. But by whom is it paid? Certainly by the purchaser of the article, whether of foreign or of domestic manufacture. The duty constitutes a part of the price of the whole mass of the article in the market. It is substantially paid upon the article of domestic manufacture as well as upon that of foreign production. Upon one it is a bounty, upon the other a burden, and the repeal of the tax must operate as an equivalent reduction of the price of the article, whether foreign or domestic. * * *
> The incidental effect of competition in the market, excited on the part of the domestic manufacturer by the aggravation of duty upon the corresponding article imported from abroad to reduce the price of the article, must be transient and momentary. The general and permanent effect must be to increase the price of the article to the extent of the additional duty, and it is then paid by the consumer. If it were not so, if the general effect of adding to a duty were to make the price of the article upon which it is levied less, the converse of the proposition would also be true, and the operation for increasing the price of the domestic article would be to repeal the duty upon the same article imported—an experiment which the friends of our internal industry will not be desirous of making. We can not subscribe, therefore, to the doctrine that the duties of import protective of our own manufactures are paid by the foreign merchant or manufacturer.

Mr. DAWES. What is the date of that?

Mr. COKE. Eighteen hundred and thirty-two. It is the report of John Quincy Adams. It is report No. 481.

Mr. DAWES. That was fifty-six years ago.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the principle changed?

Mr. DAWES. Fifty-six years ago! We have had the experience of fifty-six years since then——

Mr. COKE. Yes, I guess we have, but we have never yet had an abler man than John Quincy Adams from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator is willing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COKE. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Does he mean by yielding to interrupt me the moment I begin?

Mr. COKE. I did not know you were proceeding, and beg pardon for the interruption.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say, sir, that that experience has demonstrated, and the price current of every article affected by a protective duty will prove what I stated, that prices have been going down all the time under the influence of protection. If the Senator can tell me how a man can come into this country when he finds the market occupied and put an addition upon the cost of his article equal to the duty, and make a man side by side who can get it without duty pay the duty—if the Senator can invent a way to make him do it, I should like to hear it.

Another thing. This duty, the Senator says, is not only a tax upon the man who buys the foreign article, but it enables the domestic manufacturer to raise the price of his product to that level.

Mr. COKE. That is what Adams said.

Mr. DAWES. Wait one moment until I get through. If that is so, it enables the domestic manufacturer to put a profit upon his article over and above its cost equal to what we call the tariff or duty. Now, the Senator says that the average duty or tax upon all manufactures consumed in this country is 47 per cent. Two-thirds of all consumed in this country is produced in this country, and, according to the Senator's theory, the producer can add to the cost 47 per cent. He could not build a wall around a manufactory high enough to keep all the capital of the country from going into the production if it could make 47 per cent. out of it.

Whenever the foreigner brings his articles in here and pays the duty and finds the market empty, as he will under free trade, as he will under any tariff that drives out the domestic manufacture, when he finds the market empty, he can charge his duty upon the consumer; but when he finds the market occupied by the American producer, he has got to pay the duty himself and bring himself down to the common price.

Mr. COKE. The Senator, as all protectionists do, claims for the protective tariffs all the advances made by all the elements of civilization in this country for the last one hundred years. That is what he does.

Mr. DAWES. About fifty.

Mr. COKE. He claims for the protective tariff the benefits conferred by all the machinery, by all the inventions, by all the labor-saving appliances that have been invented in a hundred years all over the world.

Mr. President, while the average of the tariff is 47 per cent., I have never taken the position that the entire 47 per cent. is added to the price of all the articles of domestic manufacture. I believe that in various ways that is decreased. I do believe that of that 47 per cent. an average of at least 30 per cent. is placed upon all the manufactured products of this country. This, I think, can be demonstrated.

Mr. DAWES. Now, allow——

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator excuse me for a little while? He made a speech awhile ago. Now, I want to say very little more. I believe that the workingman, for whose interest and benefit it is asserted the tariff is enacted, is the worst-swindled man in this country under it, except the farmer.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to ask you a question now.

Mr. COKE. I will not right now.

The workingman saves little or nothing of his wages. When the end of the year comes he has expended it all in living. The cost of his living is increased from 30 to 47 per cent., while he receives a pittance of from 18 to 21 per cent. in the different branches of manufacture in which he is employed. The operation of the tariff will after awhile be understood by the plain people of this country. They are being rapidly educated upon it.

Senators say they have a popular verdict approving the Republican tariff scheme; that the question is settled. I tell them they were never more mistaken. The fight has only commenced. The agitation will continue, will go on without ceasing, will not let up, but increase in warmth and vigor and earnestness until it is settled and determined that there can be no lawful or legitimate taxation except that which aims alone to raise revenue for the support of the Government.

But to return to the amendment I propose. I appeal to Senators not to increase the tax upon the cotton producers of the South, as this bill does, professing at the same time to be reducing taxes, and as the Senate has just refused to lessen the taxes of these people, at least to leave the burden where it stands now under existing law, as my amendment proposes.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas declined rather brusquely to yield to me after he had answered my suggestion. If it arose from anything that I said which annoyed him, I regret it very much.

Mr. COKE. I assure the Senator that I meant no discourtesy to him. I was simply in the middle of a sentence, and I did not feel like yielding then.

Mr. DAWES. I am sure the Senator knows that whatever I may have said I did not mean to be in any way discourteous to him.

The Senator says that he does not think that all this 47 per cent. is by the operation and effect of the law an addition to the cost of the article on the part of the consumer. The President says it is. The President says that this duty enables the domestic producer to add an equal amount to the cost of his article, so that those who buy the domestic article, as well as those who buy the foreign article, are obliged to pay an equivalent, which goes, he says, into the pocket of the producer and never reaches the Government. Of course, if that be so, it is clean profit. Now, the Senator says he does not agree with the President to that extent, because there are other considerations which enter into the matter, and he does not think that it enables the domestic producer to put on more than 30 per cent. profit. He insists upon it that the American producer is enabled by this tariff duty to put on 30 per cent. profit.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. DAWES. Let me get through with this and then I will.

There is nothing to hinder every mortal of the 60,000,000 people in this country going into any one kind of manufacturing; and if you just convince the capitalist that he can make 30 per cent. in the manufacture of articles affected by the tariff, he will not be lending his money out in Iowa and Minnesota by the hundred millions at 6 per cent., as my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], the Senator's colleague, says he is doing. I want to know why it is that $300,000,000 have been loaned out by capitalists in Iowa and other Western States at 6 per cent. interest when the same capitalists can put it into the manufacture of articles covered by the protective duties and make 30 per cent.?

My colleague [Mr. HOAR] suggests, how is it that the Government can get its bonds taken at the low rate of 4 per cent. or 3½ per cent. or 3.65, when the money can be invested in manufactures, under the cover of law, so as to make 30 per cent.? I suggest with due respect, with all respect to my friend from Texas [Mr. COKE], that he is mistaken. There is no truth in that statement. The fact is that the duty is only a tax upon the consumer when the foreign product finds an empty market here, but the object of the duty is to enable the American manufacturer to fill the market, and when the foreigner comes here with his article and finds the market supplied he has to come to the American terms and pay all the additional expense himself. It is as plain as A, B, C.

Besides all this, the statistics are open to my friend which show that the average dividends of all manufacturing establishments for twenty-five years have not exceeded 5 per cent.; and yet the Senator will tell the American people that they are taxed to enable the producer in this country to pocket 30 per cent. profit, and in order to stop that condition of things we must surrender our industries to the foreigner, and let the foreigner, after he has extinguished production here, set the price himself upon that which he sells us.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VANCE. I just want to inquire if the market is empty, so that I can introduce something [laughter], and then I will give way to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANCE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. I simply desire to say, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that my proposition was that the consumers pay 30 per cent. more for all they consume by reason of the protective tariff. After the manufacturers pay their $10,000 or $15,000 or $20,000 salaries to their presidents and to their clerks and to all their nephews and all their kinfolks who are employed, I do not mean to say that after doing that they have 30 per cent. to divide among the stockholders in dividends. I simply mean to say that I think it is susceptible of demonstration that the people of this country pay 30 per cent. additional for everything they consume by reason of the existence of the tariff.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I owe an apology to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], for I promised to yield to him, and forgot to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I only wanted to call the attention of the Senator to what appeared to me to be a misstatement of facts that I supposed he did not intend to make. He stated that the President of the United States said in his message that the 47 per cent. of duty on the imported article was paid also to the manufacturer of the domestic article. The Senator omitted to state that the language of the President was that in many instances this was the case, and the statement made by the Senator from Texas was exactly in the same line. He said the average was, in his opinion, 30 per cent. He did not undertake to say that in no case was 47 per cent. ever taken.

Mr. DAWES. The language of the President was in one place that nearly the same amount was added to the cost of production by the American producer, and before he got through, being led on by the zeal of the argument, he omitted the word "nearly" and stated that it was the amount.

The Senator from Texas now says that very possibly the manufacturer does not put all that 30 per cent. in his own pocket, but he gives away all but 5 or 6 per cent. of it to his clerks and his presidents and his officials, and does not keep in his own pocket more than 5 per cent. of it, and gives the rest away. To such extremes are men led who start from the false premise that this duty is a tax upon the consumer. It meets the fact at every turn in the history of all the industries of the country which it is obliged to get around in some such way as that.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question in the line of his suggestion, because I should like to have it explained? We import largely of a given article, to the New York market, say, and we are manufacturing in New York or elsewhere in this country precisely the same kind and the same quality of article; for many years we have imported and are continuing to import, and for the same period we have manufactured and are continuing to manufacture it; and both the imported and the home manufactured article are being sold from day to day in the same market to the same people; do they not sell at the same price?

Mr. DAWES. Very likely. If of the same quality I presume they do sell at the same price.

Mr. HARRIS. Then is it not certain, or if it be not certain, I should be glad to have the Senator's answer, that the importer would not continue from year to year to import and sell unless he made at least a reasonable or some profit upon the transaction after paying the duty? And if the two sell at the same price does not the consumer pay the tax as well upon the home manufactured competing article as he does upon the imported article?

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator a fact which occurred within the last six months in a trade which has been going on in that way for a great many years—the manufacture and importation of woolen goods. A foreign manufacturer came over to this country with $225,000 worth of woolen goods—I know the names of all the parties connected with this transaction—and offered them at so low a rate to a very large producer in this country of ready-made clothing that it surprised him so much that he went among the heavy dealers and got two of them to join him in purchasing the whole amount, and after the check was drawn for that whole amount he asked this foreign producer how much he had made on that sale of $225,000 worth of these goods. "Made!" said he, "I lost $40,000 on it." He was asked, "Why did you bring them here and offer them in our market for $40,000 less than the cost?" The answer was, "They are what is left; we filled our market and have got these over, and it is a dead loss to us unless we can turn it, and every dollar that we can get from it is so much gain." That is the way he can sell by the side of our producer.

Mr. HARRIS. Am I to understand from the answer of the Senator that he thinks all of our importations, or the majority of them, or any considerable proportion of them are simply the refuse stocks left over in foreign countries and sent here to be sacrificed and gotten rid of?

Mr. DAWES. Whether it is a large majority or not I do not know, but I have no doubt that it is a considerable proportion; and in the legitimate trade where the foreign manufacturer is able to come in and compete with the American producer it is attributable to the fact that he can obtain the labor and all the cost that enters into the production of his article so much cheaper that he can pay the duty and bring himself still on a level in the market with the American producer.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will yield, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to withhold that motion for a moment that I may make a request of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey, the Chair understands, moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McPHERSON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I am compelled to go to my home in Connecticut to-morrow, to be absent for the rest of the week. There are some items in this bill which we shall come to possibly while I am gone—though I think not—in which I am interested and which I should like to have passed over. They are paragraphs 171 and 172, about cutlery, and paragraphs 173 and 181 about fire-arms. I wish the Senate would give unanimous consent that if those paragraphs are reached during my absence they may be passed over until my return. I shall be back on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that paragraphs 171, 172, 173, and 181 may be passed over informally, should they be reached during the present week, until his return from Connecticut. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I renew my motion.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri wanted a brief executive session. I promised him to make that motion at 5 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is not here; let us have it to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. You mean the senior Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I mean the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. I will not press the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 13, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 12, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The following additional members appeared and took their seats:

Mr. CHARLES H. GIBSON, of Maryland.

Mr. JOSEPH M. CAREY, of Wyoming.

Mr. ISAAC S. STRUBLE, of Iowa.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL OF MAY 21, 1888.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In examining the advance sheets of the House Journal of last session as sent to the Public Printer, I find on page 1956 in the proceedings of May 21, 1888, that on my motion to move to suspend the rules and pass House bill 8191, the bill known as "An act to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, and create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture," the published Journal fails to give the title of the bill or its number.

The entry which appears in the Journal is simply this: "Mr. HATCH, under instructions from the Committee on Agriculture, moved to suspend the rules." I find, from an examination of the minutes of the Journal Clerk, that the title and number of the bill were correctly stated by him, but in transcribing the minutes in the Clerk's office and in preparing the Journal for publication those points were omitted and there was no statement of the title or the number of the bill which I moved to pass under a suspension of the rules. The closing line of the entry is: "So the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed;" but there is nowhere a statement of what the bill was. I move that the Journal be corrected, and that the Journal Clerk be instructed to correct the proof-sheets of the printed Journal, so that the statement there shall conform to the minutes and show the number and title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] moves that the printed Journal of the proceedings of the House of the 21st of May, 1888, be corrected so as to show the facts as stated by him.

Mr. HATCH. I find upon examination of the RECORD of the proceedings of that day that it is correct, stating properly and in full the motion made by me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the printed Journal be corrected so as to state in full the number and title of the bill which he moved to pass, under the suspension of the rules, on the 21st day of May last, and that the Clerk of the House be directed to correct the printed Journal accordingly.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, how does the original Journal describe the transaction?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not examined.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that a correction of the printed Journal would not be sufficient.

Mr. HATCH. The minutes of the Journal Clerk show the title and number of the bill correctly, but in transcribing the entry from the minutes into the Journal of the House, the number and title of the bill were left out, and they were also left out of the proof-sheets or the copy sent to the Public Printer for publication.

Mr. REED. As I understood the Chair, the motion which is being put is to correct the published Journal. It seems to me that there must be an original Journal, of which the printed publication is only a copy, and if a correction is to be made, I think it ought to be made in the original.

Mr. HATCH. That was my motion, to correct the Journal of the House and also the proof-sheets.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair did not state the gentleman's motion correctly. The Chair understood the gentleman to move that the Clerk be directed to correct the proof-sheets. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] is that the Clerk be directed to correct the original manuscript Journal of the House and also the proof-sheets in accordance with what is shown by the manuscript minutes.

Mr. HATCH. And shown also by the indorsement on the bill, which shows that the bill passed the House on the 21st day of May, 1888, under a suspension of the rules.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. Now I ask unanimous consent to report a bill back to the House from the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first proceed to execute the rule of the House unless some matter of privilege is presented.

RELIEF OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

On motion of Mr. PEEL, by unanimous consent, the House non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate and asked for a conference.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of Mr. PEEL, Mr. HUDD, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the House.

NEW YORK, LAKE ERIE AND WESTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 779) for the relief of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence.

PAYMENT OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back with a favorable recommendation the resolution which I send to the desk and to ask for its consideration now.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 10, 1888.

Mr. ROGERS introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives whether in his opinion there will result any embarrassment or delay in the administration of the law in the courts of the United States because of the following proviso attached to the appropriation for the payment of the fees and expenses of United States marshals and deputies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, namely:

"'Provided, That not exceeding $300,000 of this appropriation may be advanced to marshals, to be accounted for in the usual way, the residue to remain in the Treasury, to be used, if at all, only in the payment of the accounts of marshals in the manner provided in section 856 of the Revised Statutes.'"

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. HATCH. I now ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Agriculture, with the Senate amendments, the bill known as the Agricultural Department bill. I ask that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in and the conference asked by the Senate agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill, with the amendments, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 8191, to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, September 21, 1888.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments:

Page 1, lines 1 and 2, strike out "established at the seat of government of the United States.

Page 1, line 3, strike out "to be known as the Department of Agriculture."

Page 1, line 12, strike out the word "and" where it occurs a second time.

Page 1, line 17, after "the" where it occurs the second time insert "first."

Page 1, line 19, strike out "law" and insert "laws."

Strike out all of section 5.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] that the House non-concur in these amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate?

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that question is determined I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri state the substance of section 5.

Mr. OATES. If this is likely to provoke discussion, I must call the regular order.

Mr. HATCH. I am not going to take up any time. I have the floor and will not yield to any one for discussion or consume any time myself in discussing the bill. I will simply answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who is a friend of the bill. We want to get the bill in conference in order to perfect it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I merely asked the gentleman to state the substance of section 5.

Mr. HATCH. That is the section providing for the transfer of the Weather Bureau service to the new Department. I want to keep that in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? The Chair hears none; and the order is made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], as the Chair understands, demands the regular order.

Mr. CASWELL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the special order, known as the direct-tax bill; and pending that motion I move that the general debate terminate at quarter past 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] desires to report the river and harbor bill for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and printed. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] yield?

Mr. CASWELL. I will yield for that purpose.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to report the bill which I send to the desk, and to ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

The bill (H. R. 11765) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, all points of order being reserved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—SULLIVAN VS. FELTON.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged report,

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged motion now pending.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana. The report I submit is of the highest privilege, being the report in a contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The report will be sent to the desk.

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana, from the Committee on Elections, submitted the report of the committee in the contested-election case of Frank J. Sullivan, contestant, vs. Charles N. Felton, contestee; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ROWELL. I ask leave to submit the views of the minority, to be printed with the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL. With the consent of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] I ask unanimous consent that members having reports to make from the various committees of the House may have leave to present them at the Clerk's desk for proper reference to the Calendars.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

PRINTING OF REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably Senate concurrent resolution to print 38,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1887–'88; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10514) for the relief of Thomas Lannigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES M. M'CLELLAND.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 11766) for the relief of James M. McClelland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WARREN HALL.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3228) for the relief of Warren Hall; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY CONTINGENT FUND, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, with the concurrence of the gentleman from Alabama, who yields for that purpose, to submit at this time for consideration a bill, and to ask——

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has the floor and has a privileged motion pending.

Mr. SAYERS. I make the request also with the concurrence of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill in regard to a deficiency in the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for present consideration; and further ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000, to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees of the House of Representatives for the fiscal year 1889.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 11764) was read a first and second time, ordered to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and being so considered, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUND OF THE DIRECT TAX.

Mr. CASWELL. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the pending order, and further move that all general debate on the bill be closed within one hour—that is to say, at twenty minutes past 1 o'clock to-day.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on this bill will be closed in one hour.

Mr. CASWELL. That time is to be equally divided between the friends and the opponents of the bill. I yield the first half hour in opposition to the bill to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. OATES. I yield twenty minutes of that time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively to all that has been said by the advocates of this bill in this Hall, and from whatever standpoint it is looked at it seems to me bad legislation and a vicious precedent.

By an act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, the United States levied and appropriated among the inhabitants of the several States and Territories a direct tax of $20,000,000, and provided for its collection. Under this act and amendments thereto collections were made from individuals residing in various States; and many of the States assumed the amounts apportioned to their respective inhabitants, receiving a commission therefor of 15 per cent. In some of the Southern States the United States was not able to collect this tax at the time, and some of it has not yet been collected. Of the $20,000,000 there has been collected (including the 15 per cent.) $17,359,685.51.

Congress passed acts from time to time suspending the collection of the remainder. The last of these acts was passed July 23, 1868, and carried the suspension up until January 1, 1869. Since that time no effort has been made to collect any part of this tax except by set-off, which the Supreme Court of the United States has held to be inadmissible. By this bill here under consideration it is proposed to pay to the several States on whose inhabitants this tax was imposed and from whom it was collected a sum equal to the sum collected from them.

The reason or pretext put forward for this is that, as the inhabitants of some of the States have not paid their quota of the tax, the amount collected ought to be paid back to those that have paid. This is a novel doctrine. There perhaps never was a tax laid in any State, county, or city that was enforced against every person or all the property subject to it. To hold that as legal ground for the refunding of such a tax would paralyze any government. No principle or precedent can be cited, I think, in support of such a position.

Nor, when the facts are understood, is there any more reason or ground for the claim that equity or justice requires the repayment.

It needs no argument to prove, for every one admits, that a tax levied on the whole people should be so far as practicable enforced against all or none. If that were the principle underlying this bill it would have my hearty support. But there are other facts than those above stated proper to be considered. That part of the direct tax unpaid is back in the so-called cotton States, against whose citizens it could not be enforced at the time it was collected from the other States. It clearly was the duty of the United States to enforce that or some equivalent tax against the people of those States as soon as practicable, and this was done, as I shall attempt to show.

After the levy of the direct tax, when the power of the Government over the cotton States was restored, it being found difficult and expensive to collect the direct tax, the United States levied a cotton tax of $3 a bale (it was at first $2) on all cotton in those States. By this tax there was collected in the years 1863 to 1868, inclusive—almost all in the three last-named years—over $68,000,000, no corresponding or equivalent tax having been laid on any other property in those or in any other States.

Out of respect for the legislators of that time, and in view of the circumstances, I am constrained to believe that this cotton tax must have been imposed for the purpose of compelling the people of those States to bear their share of a burden which they had before escaped. If this were not so, it would be impossible to resist the conclusion that that tax was most unjust and oppressive. If a tax of $1 a barrel was imposed on all flour manufactures, or $10 a head on every horse or steer, or 25 cents on every bushel of wheat, no other property being taxed, we would at once cry out that it was not only unconstitutional, but intolerably unjust, and it is impossible to distinguish such a tax in principle from the cotton tax.

As to this cotton tax, it should also be said that it has always been claimed that it was unconstitutional, and I must admit that it so seems to me. But I do not propose to discuss the question of the constitutionality of that tax. No one has a right dogmatically to assert that it was or was not constitutional, for in a case properly brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, one of the judges being absent, the court was equally divided on the question—four affirming and four denying the constitutionality of the law. But, whether constitutional or unconstitutional, its justice can only be affirmed on the ground that it was intended as an offset to the burden of some tax which had before been collected from other States.

But it is said that the cotton tax was borne by the consumers and not by the producers or owners, and therefore was a tax on the whole people.

I do not argue that this tax all fell on the people of the cotton States.

It did not. Some of the owners of the cotton doubtless lived in other States, and it may be with truth admitted that the tax more or less enhanced the price of cotton, and therefore was in some small part borne by the consumer. But while it is true, as a rule, that taxes fall wholly or principally on the consumers of the commodity taxed, the rule is subject to reasonable limitations, and is obviously hardly applicable at all where the tax, as in this case, is merely a temporary expedient, not intended or understood to be a rule of taxation.

The fact therefore remains and is indisputable that the burden of this cotton tax was primarily and principally on the inhabitants of those States, and was beyond a question more than an equivalent—yes, more than ten times an equivalent—for the direct tax not collected from them. I have here, and shall incorporate in my remarks in the RECORD, a table showing the sums due the United States on the direct tax, and in what States, and the sums collected on cotton in those States.

Name of State.	Direct tax unpaid.	Cotton tax collected.
Alabama	$511,023.30	$10,388,072.10
Arkansas	107,184.82	2,555,638.43
Colorado	715.37
Florida	72,762.27	918,944.48
Georgia	466,384.44	11,897,094.98
Louisiana	71,385.83	10,098,501.00
Mississippi	302,046.21	8,742,995.93
North Carolina	198,742.06	1,959,704.87
Tennessee	277,493.52	7,873,460.71
Texas	174,265.16	5,502,401.24
Utah	26,982.00	1,375.34
Virginia	286,662.93	825,856.87
Washington	3,487.17
South Carolina	141,174.31	4,172,420.16

In round numbers there was back a little over $2,600,00 of the direct tax. There was collected from them over $68,000,000 of the cotton tax.

So far as these States are concerned against whose inhabitants the direct tax was not enforced no fair-minded man can, I think, after an understanding of the facts, affirm that they have escaped their fair share of the burden of taxation, or that it would be equitable to enforce against them payment of the balance of the direct tax which has not been by that name enforced. I doubt whether there would be found a man in this House who would advocate such a proposition or claim that it would be just if that single question were directly presented. Not only would it be unjust to enforce that tax, but it would make a precedent and an argument in favor of the enforcement of the cotton tax; for there is no reason that can be urged in favor of the refunding of the former that may not be urged with greater weight in favor of the refunding of the latter.

It is said by the advocates of this bill on the Republican side of the House that if those against whom the cotton tax was imposed go into the courts and get a decree of the United States Supreme Court that the tax was unconstitutional they will favor the repeal of the law and the refunding of the money collected under it. I can not agree to that proposition. The same reason would require the refunding of many other taxes imposed during the war. Such a proposition should not be entertained for a moment. As I have shown, the basis of this direct-tax bill is a claim merely that this tax was unequal. No one pretends that it was illegal. To make inequality a ground for the restoration of the numerous taxes or assessments of the war is a position so alarming and manifestly untenable as to require no argument in opposition to it. Whoever unsettles the adjustment of those times will open a Pandora's box, out of which will come forth innumerable evils to vex and plague us. Sound public policy requires that none of these questions should be reopened; that none of those taxes paid should be refunded; that those things that were settled by the legislators of those days should remain settled.

The facts above stated show that the direct tax has not, in fact, borne unequally on the non-cotton States, and that the remainder of that tax standing on the books of the Treasury against the people of the cotton States should not be enforced against them.

Mr. Chairman, the equalization of taxation is not the object and would not be the effect of this bill. That is merely the pretext laid hold of by many, at least, of its supporters.

But this disguise will not mislead any one long who carefully considers the facts, or who seeks to discover the influences that are behind the measure. It is one of a series of measures or bills to deplete or empty the Treasury without the payment of one dollar of our debt, or any reduction of taxation. It is an attempt to establish a precedent for the collection of taxes by the General Government for distribution among the States.

This is an old nostrum of the tariff monopolists, a device to enable them to increase or keep up the burden of the taxes on the masses for their own benefit and enrichment. For this there is no warrant in the Constitution of the United States.

The powers of the Federal Government are only such as are granted expressly or by clear implication, and I am unable to find any section or clause of that charter that can fairly be held to give any such power. This reason alone would, of course, be conclusive of my vote on this bill. But even if the unconstitutionality of the measure did not stand in the way, other weighty considerations would constrain me to oppose it. As has been said by one of our ablest writers on economics, David A. Wells—

> Federal taxes, with very few exceptions, are levied on commodities, fall on consumption, and are therefore necessarily paid by the consumer. The burden of such taxes must therefore be disproportionately heavier on the man who from necessity expends all or nearly all of his wages, salary, or other income in mere living than on him who only expends one-half or one-third, or a smaller proportion of his income for like purposes, and lays up the surplus for increasing his resources.

For instance, of the tax collected on lumber, salt, sugar, tin-plate, clothing, and many other articles, the poor man not worth more than a few hundred or a few thousand dollars may pay as much as the man worth as many hundred thousands. Many a man who has hard work to make both ends meet would pay as much of such a tax as Gould, Sage, or Vanderbilt.

The bill is, under a thin and almost transparent disguise, an attempt to inaugurate a system of taxation which will distribute the burdens of the Government on the people in proportion to their needs and consumption rather than in proportion to their wealth or ability to pay—a mode of increasing the taxes of the masses for the enrichment of a few favored classes. In my judgment, no measure more repugnant to the Constitution, to sound economic principles, and to justice has been before this Congress. Its enactment would be a most pernicious precedent.

But, Mr. Chairman, if not one of the foregoing objections existed, I would, as a representative of Minnesota, be constrained to oppose this bill.

The real purpose of the bill, as we have seen, is to distribute the surplus now in the Treasury, making necessary the re-collection of a like sum; for what is thus taken out of the Treasury must be replaced by the taxation of the people. And no person giving the least consideration to the question can fail to see that in an equitable division of this sum Minnesota would be entitled to nearly four times as much as this bill allows her, and will be taxed $4 for every one she receives.

For instance, New Hampshire, with a population of 346,399, is to get $218,406; Maine, with a population of 648,936, is to get $420,926; Connecticut, with a population of 622,800, is to get $308,214; Rhode Island, with a population of 276,513, is to get $116,963; while Minnesota, with a population of 780,773, is to get only $108,524. I might multiply illustrations of its unfairness if necessary. If this surplus is to be divided the division should be made fairly. If we are to proceed in disregard of the Constitution and of public policy I am unwilling that Minnesota shall be put off with less than her share. But I wish to emphasize my position. My radical objection to this bill is that it is repugnant to the Constitution and a precedent for the unfair and unequal imposition of the burdens of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has occupied fifteen minutes of the time yielded to him.

Mr. OATES. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I can not see my way clear to support this bill, and I wish to give in brief some of the reasons why I can not do so.

In the first place, the direct tax was levied in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and was lawfully levied for a patriotic purpose. In so far as that tax was paid by the States it was properly paid. It can not be said, then, that the amounts paid by the various States and the people thereof constitute in any way a claim against the Government of the United States. It is neither a debt due from the United States to the States themselves nor to the people of the States. Then if there is no equitable or legal obligation on the part of the Government to refund this tax, what does the proposition to refund it amount to?

It is simply a proposition to donate the money to the various States. Now, I deny the existence of any constitutional authority to make such a donation. It was claimed in my State during the campaign that the State was in debt, and the $400,000 that she will get, or about that amount in round numbers, will enable Iowa to pay her debt without assessing the people in the usual way. But, Mr. Chairman, I deny that Congress has any power to appropriate money to pay the debts of the States. Hence I conclude that the proposition in the first place lacks constitutional validity.

In the next place, this is a proposition to pay Southern war claims. The State of Virginia paid $442,000 of this tax. Texas paid $180,000, South Carolina paid $222,000, North Carolina $317,000, Missouri $761,000, Kentucky $713,000, Georgia $117,000; in all, about four and a half millions of dollars out of the seventeen and a half millions collected was paid by the States that were either in open rebellion against the Government of the United States or had furnished troops to the Southern army.

Now, sir, if this were a proposition to refund the tax paid by the States engaged in the rebellion and that furnished troops to the Southern army, there would be a howl that would be heard all over the North and all over this country against paying back to those States the tribute extorted from them for the purpose of putting down their own rebellion. That is what this tax was collected for, to assist in putting down the rebellion; and the proposition to pay it back to them is no more, no less, than a proposition to reimburse, in part, the Southern States for their losses incurred during the war. I know it is relieved somewhat, in the estimation of some gentlemen, by the fact that the Northern States get a "divy." But the fact that certain Northern States have pooled their interests does not alter the fact nor add any merit to the bill.

These gentlemen are perfectly willing that this tax shall be paid back to Virginia; perfectly willing that South Carolina shall have the amount which she paid given back to her, provided Iowa, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania and the other Northern States can have a "divy" in the matter, and can be permitted to put their hands into the Treasury.

Sir, it may as well be admitted now as at any other time that the Southern States did not pay their share in putting down the rebellion. They did not pay their share of the stamp tax, the whisky tax, the income tax, the tax upon the gross earnings of railroads, the tax upon manufactures, or of any other tax levied to suppress the rebellion; and if you are to pay back to the States of the North—the loyal States, if you please—their share of this tax, upon the theory that the South did not pay their fair share, why is it not proper to go into a regular examination of the respective shares paid by the Southern and Northern States, rip up the whole question and have a readjustment, and assess the whole country to pay back to the loyal States all that they paid out for the suppression of the rebellion? This proposition is not only unconstitutional, but highly unreasonable and absurd.

The fact that we have a surplus in the Treasury does not give propriety or justice to this measure. If the Government of the United States owes the States—the States that paid this tax—the amount provided for in this bill, it owes it without regard to whether we have a surplus in the Treasury or not. We are the trustees of the money now in the Treasury. It was collected for certain purposes, and we are in honor bound to thwart all propositions to expend it unlawfully. If we must pay back the seventeen and a half millions collected through the direct tax, let us do so by levying another direct tax for that purpose. Let each State pay its proportion. The money now in the Treasury was collected for different purposes, and belongs to all the people who now live in the United States; and we are trustees to see that it is properly disbursed. It shall never be disbursed in the payment of the amount carried in this bill if my vote can prevent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. OATES. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill as it comes from the Senate and also as reported from the Judiciary Committee, because I believe it both unjust and unconstitutional. In discussing a similar bill in the Forty-ninth Congress on the 14th day of February, 1887, I made some observations that I will now repeat:

THE DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

It is admitted that the direct-tax bill of 1861 was constitutional. No State paid more of the direct tax than was legally assessed against its citizens. The tax was in no sense a charge against the States in their sovereign or corporate capacity. The only effect of that law was to fix an amount for each State beyond which the United States collector could not go in his collections from the citizens thereof, who alone were liable for such tax. The amount apportioned to each State was assessed against the tax-payers residing therein in proportion to the amount of land each owned, and so it was the individual citizens and not the States who became indebted to the United States. The States who paid it were allowed 15 per cent. for collecting. This was the reason some States assumed it. There was no effort to collect this tax from the citizens of the Southern States at that time. They were in rebellion. No one believed that it would ever be collected. The tax was not a lien upon the land, and was only a debt against the citizens. Many of them were killed in battle, others have since died from natural causes, and nearly all of those who now survive had their property swept away by the war and are insolvent.

The United States finding it impossible to collect the taxes, either during or since the war, from the citizens of the Southern States, have charged the amounts apportioned to each of these States to the States in their corporate capacity, and the accounting officers, by reason of these unwarranted charges, withhold from the States all sums due from the United States, and in this way payment is being coerced without law. The only reason given for this bill is that as the tax was collected in the Northern and not in the Southern States the whole amount, about fifteen millions, should be refunded and credited to the States, and the unpaid three million remitted to the delinquent States. It is said by the friends of the bill that this will equalize the matter and save the United States much trouble and litigation with the Southern States. Many Southern Representatives, believing that it is the only way to relieve their States of these illegal and unjust charges, are disposed to support the bill. Such was the feeling of Southern Senators who voted for the measure.

While I am satisfied that Congress has no power to pass this bill as it comes from the Judiciary Committee, I shall not detain the committee to discuss that point. I fully agree with the views so ably expressed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]:

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution empowers Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises for three general purposes, namely: (1) to pay the debts, (2) to provide for the common defense, and (3) to provide for the general welfare of the United States. Can it be said with any degree of truth that these taxes, which were legally laid, collected, and applied a quarter of a century ago, constitute a debt in any sense of that word?

The mere statement of the question is its own refutation. Is this appropriation proposed by this bill for the common defense? Is a single dollar of the money by its terms to be applied to the construction of ships, or purchase of guns and materials of war, or for the erection of forts and providing coast defenses, or to raise, equip, or maintain an army, or in any other wise to provide for the common defense? Nothing of the kind can be discovered among its provisions. On the contrary, it is "to reimburse these States, Territories," etc., money paid in obedience to lawful requirement and applied to the common defense in actual war twenty-five years ago. It is substantially a proposition to give a large amount of money to a part of the States and Territories of the Union; in the language of the bill, "to reimburse" them for money which they as States and Territories did not pay, but which was paid by the land-owners within their borders.

Next let us inquire if the appropriation proposed by this bill falls within the third grand purpose for which the taxing power of the United States may be exercised, i. e., to provide for the general welfare of the United States? We hold, in accordance with sound interpretation and the fundamental principles of the party to which we belong, that this clause does not confer power upon Congress to do whatsoever the majority wills, but to lace Congress up strictly within the powers enumerated in the Constitution and such implied powers as are necessary to be exercised in order to give force and efficacy to those expressed.

In vain do we look through the twenty-eight express grants of power to Congress of the Constitution to find any to which this bill is applicable, or which in any remote degree, by implication or otherwise, confers the power to pass it.

The powers expressly conferred upon Congress to lay and collect taxes are plenary and unlimited, and if there be no limits to the powers of appropriation, the United States is a government of unlimited power. Such a construction blows up the Constitution as with dynamite, and would change the character of the Government, and in the course of time imperil the liberties of the people. It substitutes the unbridled discretion of Congress for a written constitution which for one hundred years has maintained a government the most marvelous and successful of any in the history of civilization.

The people of this country are more vitally interested in restricting Congress in the matter of appropriations to the powers conferred by the Constitution than they are in any other of the provisions of that great charter, for the reason that these are more frequently transcended and abused, usurpations popularized and disguised by the large amount of treasure disbursed; and thus the money of the people is appropriated by their servants and used for the destruction of their liberties, which the restrictions upon power in the Constitution were intended to preserve. They need not fear the unlimited powers of taxation conferred if the money raised be not misapplied, but appropriated only to the constitutional objects and purposes of the Government. If applied only to these, taxation will soon conform to the necessities created thereby, the burdens of the people will be borne without murmur or complaint, and they will have nothing to fear.

The fatal mistake of the friends of the bill is in assuming that the taxes apportioned to the States under the act of 1861 were due from the States in their political and corporate character, and that the Treasury officials had any legal right or power to charge the amounts thus apportioned to the States that did not assume them. The only argument yet made is based upon this false assumption. The tax was assessed and laid upon the real property of private individuals in the States. The public property of the States was specially exempt from the tax. I will ask the Clerk to read the following extract from a late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Louisiana case, decided October 24, 1887.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor do we regard the unpaid portion of the direct tax laid by the act of Congress of August 5, 1861, which was apportioned to Louisiana, as constituting any debt to the United States by the State in her political and corporate character, which can be set off against her demands. (12 Statutes, 292, chapter 45.) The act imposed an annual direct tax of twenty millions "upon the United States," and apportioned it to the several States of the Union. It directed that the tax should "be assessed and laid on the value of all lands and lots of ground, with their improvements and dwelling-houses." (Section 13.) It was assessed and laid upon the real property of private individuals in the States. Public property of the States and of the United States was exempted from the tax. Its apportionment was merely a designation of the amount which was to be levied upon and collected from this property of individuals in the several States, respectively.

The provisions of the act are inconsistent with any theory of the obligation of the States to pay the sums levied. It provides for the appointment of officers to assess the property to the different holders, and to collect the tax, and directs with minute detail the proceedings to be taken to enforce the collection, either by a distraint and sale of the personal property of the owners, or, that failing, by a sale of the real property taxed. It allows, it is true, the different States to assume the amount apportioned to them respectively, and to collect the same in their own way by their own officers. Many of the States did thus assume the amounts, and in such cases it may well be considered that for the sums assumed they became debtors to the United States, and, so far as any portion of those sums has not been paid, that they still remain debtors. But, unless such assumption was had, no liability attached to any State in her political and corporate character. The liability was upon the individual land-owners within her limits. The act declares that the amount of taxes assessed "shall be and remain a lien upon all lands and other real estate of the individuals who may be assessed for the same during two years after the time it shall annually become due and payable." (Section 33.)

Louisiana never assumed the payment of the taxes apportioned to her, or of any portion of them. She allowed the Government to proceed by its officers to collect the tax from the property-holders. The amount apportioned to her was $385,886.67; the amount collected from the owners of land was $314,500.84, leaving only a balance of $71,385.83. It is not for us to suggest in what way this balance may be collected. After the war the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to suspend the collection of the tax in any of the States previously declared in insurrection, until January, 1868, and subsequently this authority was extended to January, 1869. (14 Statutes, 331, section 14; 15 Statutes, 260, chapter 69.) The Secretary acted upon this authority and suspended the collection. It is stated that since 1869 no attempts have been made by the executive department to enforce its collection in those States. Be that as it may, it is enough for the disposition of the present case that the unpaid balance of the tax apportioned to Louisiana constitutes no debt on the part of the State in her political and corporate character to the United States.

Mr. McRAE. This I think ought to forever settle the question of the liability of the States, and sustains the position I assumed before the decision was delivered.

The State of Arkansas bears the same relation to the United States as far as this tax is concerned as does the State of Louisiana. The charge made and still standing was without authority, but under this decision ought not to stand. Arkansas did not assume the payment of the sum apportioned to her. It, like all the Southern States, allowed the Government to collect the tax from the owners of real estate. The amount apportioned to her was $261,886. The amount collected by the officers, shown by the account as stated by the commissioners appointed to examine such accounts, was $186,736.44, leaving a balance of $77,803.82. The commissioners who collected this tax have failed to account for much of it. I suggest to the friends of the bill that it would be better to proceed against these defaulters than to indulge in threats against States not liable.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] indulged in some very extravagant talk about defaulting States, and mentioned by name the State of Arkansas. I say to him and to Congress that Arkansas does not owe a dollar to the United States that she is not willing and able to pay. She has honest and legal claims against the United States that more than set off the claim against her. She is anxious for a settlement. And it illy becomes a Representative from Ohio, whose State stands charged with $2,007,260.34, deposited with her under the act of June 23, 1836, while asking for $1,332,025.93 more under this bill, to go out of his way to assail the faith and good name of another State about a matter that could not in the least be affected by this proposition. The people of Arkansas are poor, but they need not and will not go to the State of Ohio to learn honesty, nor beg donations of the General Government. All she asks is fair treatment under the laws and that she shall not be discriminated against in any way.

The gentleman's remarks have not yet appeared and I trust he may modify them before they do.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is a common practice among lawyers, at least when there is no defense to a proposition upon its merits, to raise some constitutional question and if possible to accomplish its defeat. I desire the attention of the committee for a few moments while I refer to similar objections which have been raised and very ably argued in this instance upon the other side of this Chamber against the passage of this bill. It may be conceded that no express language can be found in the Constitution which makes provision for the refunding of a tax once levied and collected. But we find a clause which authorizes Congress to provide for the "common defense and general welfare of the United States." Under that provision the Government in the hour of its peril undertook to provide for the common defense and for the welfare of the whole country by laying a tax of $20,000,000 upon the States, or rather upon the landed property of the States. Underlying the question of taxation in this country may be found the principles of equality and uniformity. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] a day or two since called our attention to the fact that in the convention which adopted the Constitution much discussion was had over the proposition to apportion taxes among the States, leaving each State to collect the tax in its own way. But fear was had that some of the States might refuse to respond and fail to pay over to the Treasury their just and proper proportion, leaving the Government without remedy and with a depleted Treasury. Hence that plan was abandoned and the authority delegated to Congress to levy and enforce taxes through Federal machinery upon such property as in its wisdom might seem proper within the limits and jurisdiction of any State. In the emergency which occurred when this particular tax was levied the General Government for the first and only time in the history of this country undertook to levy and collect a direct tax. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] reminds us this morning that there is to be found no precedent for the passage of this bill. I concede it. This is the first and only direct tax that was ever levied upon the real estate of this country by the Federal Government, and it has proved a failure; such a failure, I apprehend, as will be a warning to the people to never attempt the like again.

If the Congress of the United States has the power to provide for the common defense and to lay a tax upon the people for that purpose and to apportion such tax among the several States, observing the rules of uniformity and equality so far as is possible, and if in the process of enforcing that tax it appears to be impossible to complete the collection and enforcement of the tax, has not Congress the authority to retrace its steps? Can it not refund to the States from which collections were made the money which had been received in its efforts to make the collection and thus conform to the principle of equality in laying the burdens of the General Government upon the States? If Congress can take a step forward in the line of raising revenues, has it not the power to retrace that step? May it not suspend the collection of a tax after it is levied? If it can suspend the collection, may it not refund the tax entirely to the source from which it was received?

Suppose in this instance we had made collections from only one-half the States, would any gentleman insist that we could not refund the money which we had received from that half, in order to restore the States to an equal footing? I do not understand how it can be contended that in the plenary powers of the Government to lay taxes there can not be found authority to readjust, refund, and restore equality wherever and whenever necessary.

This is not a Southern question, nor is it a Northern question. Nearly one-half of the Southern States have paid their share of this tax, either by their voluntary act, or by enforcement. Is it right or equitable to require the State of South Carolina, for instance, to pay three or four hundred thousand dollars into the Treasury of the United States for the common defense? Is it right to sell the real estate of her citizens at great sacrifice for the purpose of enforcing the tax, under the circumstances described to us on yesterday by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT], and at the same time allow the State of Alabama to escape altogether? Shall Virginia be compelled to pay the entire sum apportioned to her, and the State of Georgia passed by without the payment of a dollar? What kind of equity is that? Why, then, say this bill works injustice to the Southern States, when one-half of them are beneficiaries, equally with the States of the North, under its provisions?

Of all the States in the South, the State of Georgia is the last that should oppose the passage of this bill upon the floor of this House. She alone of all the Southern States, I think, has assumed by act of her Legislature the payment of this tax, and yet we find her leading the opposition to this most just and equitable measure. Do the gentlemen from Georgia forget that by the act of their own Legislature they are in honor bound to make this payment to the Treasury? There may be some question I concede as to the validity of the act of assumption and the power of the State to assume this tax, and upon that question I desire to say a word

I think it may be stated that all or nearly all of the Northern States of the Union assumed, or attempted to assume, by action of their Legislatures, the payment of this tax. But why did they do it? In the very act of Congress which levied it provision may be found granting to the States express authority to assume the payment. I ask these gentlemen, who can find no authority in the Constitution for restoring this tax to the source from whence it was received, where will they find authority to authorize a State to make this assumption? The tax itself was laid upon the real estate of the people. It was levied against individuals, as has been shown by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] in the decision which he sent to the Clerk's desk to be read. As is well known, the States of Louisiana and Mississippi brought actions a short time ago against the United States for the recovery of moneys due to them from the sale of public lands within their borders which the Government had withheld and applied upon this tax in offset. In these cases the Supreme Court held that the tax was against the people and not against the State in its municipal character, and that the offsetting of such moneys in liquidation of the amount of tax still standing against such States was unauthorized.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to a sea of difficulties that may arise, and will arise, under this decision, if we do not pass this bill. Why, sir, nearly one-third, I may assume, of this entire tax which has been realized by the Treasury of the United States has been realized from these offsets. In the light of these decisions, that the tax was against the people and not against the municipality, these offsets were unauthorized and illegal. Action after action may now be brought, and will be brought, against the United States for the recovery of the several sums of money which were due to the States, arising from various sources, but which have been, by the rulings of the Treasury Department, confiscated and applied in offset upon this tax.

It is said, however, that the assumption of this tax by a State changes the rule and obligates the State in its municipal capacity to its final payments, thereby making valid the acts of the Government in offsetting legitimate claims in favor of the States which had assumed the tax. In the case of Louisiana against the United States, reported in 123 United States Reports, the court suggested that such might be the effect, but that precise question was not before the court or involved in that controversy. The State of Louisiana had never assumed payment of the tax. I submit that if sufficient warrant can not be found in the Constitution to enable Congress to refund so much of this tax as has been collected, where shall we find warrant for the act authorizing the several States to assume and pay this tax from the common Treasury?

The tax was laid upon real estate alone, consequently it was against the particular owners thereof. Can the several Legislatures relieve such owners, take from their shoulders the burden and spread it upon the people of the whole State? No argument is required to show that such action would be eminently just, equal, and in the spirit of our system of taxation. But is there express or implied authority in the Constitution of the United States or in the constitution of the several States for such action? This may be very much doubted. If a State under the delegated authority of Congress may exercise this just act of equalization, why may not Congress exercise the right of returning to such of the States as have assumed the burden the money received from them? If, however, we are to apply the rule of strict construction so closely and I may say ably adhered to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], and the gentleman from Georgia, the conclusion is to me irresistible that such acts of assumption are without authority and void. If Congress had no authority to clothe the States with this power, and if they had no right to assume and discharge this burden from their common Treasury, or levy it equally upon all the people, then it is easy to be seen that such assumption was invalid, and a great number of suit will be brought against the United States to recover the moneys du these States in their municipal character upon the ground that the application of these claims upon the supposed debt against the States was illegal and void.

It may also be said that there are a number of States which have never assumed the tax, and that claims to a very great extent have been offset against such States while the debt existed only against the people. This class of cases are brought squarely within the Louisiana decision, and such application of just sums of money due these States was wholly unauthorized. There can be no question but in such cases the States have a clear cause of action against the United States. This furnishes a strong argument for the passage of this bill and the return of all moneys to the source from which they were received, as well as a speedy payment on the part of the Government of such claims as may be due the States in their own right. If the Government has without the authority of law withheld moneys due these States, and if large sums of money have been received from the several States under the assumed authority attempted to be delegated to them by Congress without constitutional right, the several transactions amount to little more than a loan of money to the General Government for the time being, and the treasuries of the States should be reimbursed as soon as possible. Such a course will save litigation to a great extent, and tend largely to place all the States upon the basis of equality.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] deprecates the payment of so much money into the treasury of his own State. He fears the demoralizing effect it may exercise upon the people of his commonwealth. Mr. Chairman, I have no such fear as to its effect upon the people of my State, nor does it seem that there is just cause for the fear he entertains. The entire amount which will be paid to any State can be profitably expended in a single year in lightening the burdens of State taxation, thereby enabling the people to retain in their pockets moneys that would otherwise be required to defray the expenses of State governments.

I have no time to discuss at much length the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. He proposes to refund the cotton tax, amounting to $68,000,000. He bases this claim upon the unconstitutionality of such tax. He asserts that it was sectional in its character, and consequently illegally laid upon that product. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] urges that it was in effect a tax upon the land that produced the cotton; therefore unequal and unjust. Such may be the effect of the levy. But it can not be said that Congress, in the exercise of its taxing power, may not select such property as it sees fit for the purposes of taxation. This question arose in 1795, when Congress laid a tax upon pleasure carriages. For some reason this species of property was selected and a tax laid upon it for the purpose of obtaining revenues. An action was brought against the owners of carriages to recover a penalty for a neglect to pay the tax. The Supreme Court, in 3 Dall., held, after a protracted discussion, that Congress had full power to lay and collect the tax.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has already called attention to the case reported in 112 United States Reports, when a similar ruling was had. The court, illustrating, refer to the heavy tax laid upon tobacco, which is grown in only a part of the States. Without hesitation the court seem to sanction the validity of such tax. Why, then, may not Congress levy a tax upon cotton? It is difficult to distinguish the one from the other. In fact, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] concedes there is no difference.

In conclusion, let me say, Mr. Chairman, it is the well-settled law of this country that the validity of a tax levied upon specific articles does not depend upon the universality of the property taxed, but upon the equality of the tax upon such property wherever found. Before yielding the floor I wish to correct an impression which is so generally entertained, that it will take more than $17,000,000 to comply with the terms of this bill. Such is not the case. It will require but little more than $15,000,000. The 15 per cent. discount allowed whenever payments were made by the States was not "collected" within the meaning of the bill, and should not be included, as it often has been, in arriving at the proper amount to be refunded.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I had intended to discuss this matter at more length than I find I may be able to do, for two reasons—chiefly because I have given away such time as I might otherwise have had; and I propose now only to touch here and there a subject incidentally connected with this case.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the object of this bill, so far as appears from the discussion, has been very much misapprehended. It is not a bill sectional in its purpose or its effect. It is not a bill involving the rights or the injuries of any political party. It is a bill simply and solely for the purpose of settling a vexed question which has been pending for many years, and to settle a partially settled affair of governmental finance.

In 1861, under the pressure of the occasion then existing, a direct tax was levied upon the people of the United States and apportioned among all the States under the provisions of the Constitution. I apprehend that no one now denies that that was then a legal tax, a legal assessment, and is legal and operative to-day. Some of the States have paid that assessment entirely and in full; some have paid it in part, and some have paid it not at all. Now, what are we going to do about it? You gentlemen who oppose the passage of this bill, which is only a settlement of that unfinished business, what do you propose to do about it? Do you propose as a matter of justice to have those States that have paid entirely and those that have paid in part continue in that position without remuneration? And then do you propose that the States which have not paid shall pay nothing; or do you propose to proceed to collect from those States the portion due from them?

Mr. Chairman, these men who are talking so loudly about the Constitution would recognize at once that the very position they take in this matter would be unconstitutional if placed in a statute. Suppose that in 1861 Congress had levied this tax upon the States that have now paid and upon no others; would anybody living fail to recognize that as an unconstitutional enactment? Yet these gentlemen with the Constitution in their mouths insist that the effect of that law shall be precisely what it could not have been made in the act itself by the whole power of Congress and the United States. And they come, as all strict constitutionalists do, with a superior touch of legal humanity about them, above all other people that I ever knew. In their hands the Constitution is always a weapon of offense and defense; and it is nothing else.

Mr. Chairman, we are confronted with a situation. That situation is exactly this: You must either pay back to the States that have paid the money which they have paid, or you must make the States that have not paid pay their share, which is unpaid.

No administration can escape this result. No proper administration of the Government can avoid this fact. It was a tax legal through all its scope. It has been paid in part, and must be paid altogether either by refunding to those who have paid or making those who have not paid pay up.

I say this bill is in the entire interest of the Gulf States which make clamor against it. For if this tax is not refunded to those who paid it then payment will be enforced on the part of those who have not yet paid their share of it. It will not do for them to say, now you have paid your share, do not ask us to pay ours. We say, on the contrary, let us take back our share without interest and we will exonerate you from the payment of your share. In the justice of this all must agree.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what would be the result? We ask simply the naked money paid, not by Ohio alone, but by South Carolina, by Tennessee, by Kentucky, by both Virginias, by North Carolina, and many other of the Southern States, be returned to the States which paid it, or to the individuals who paid it without interest for twenty-six or twenty-seven years. If on the other hand you do not accept that, then the $2,600,000 remaining unpaid is a debt existing, a constitutional debt, which must be paid. That $2,600,000 must be paid by you who have not yet paid it. It must be paid, too, with interest for twenty-six or twenty-seven years. It must also be paid with a penalty attached of 50 per cent. And yet these statesmen, upon whose shoulders that load rests, insist that is trying to do them an injury. We are taking from them three times the burden we have taken from ourselves. We give them the benefit of that advantage.

If I should talk all day on this point I could only say just what I have in reference to this matter. The charge of unconstitutionality against this proposed repayment is to my mind so absurd that I do not believe anybody is really in earnest in making it who has contemplated this subject with any care. They can not be in earnest in saying you can not pay a tax once collected. Every lawyer who sits here knows taxes are being repaid every day. Repeal the tax on tobacco to-day and how many millions of money already collected from that tax would necessarily have to go back to the parties who paid it. This is only an unfinished system of taxation which sooner or later must come to an end one way or the other.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there have been proposed by the committee to which this case was referred only two amendments. I wish to speak of those amendments in the presence of so many members of the committee as do me the honor to listen to me, for it may be a matter of importance to them.

The first amendment is found in the first section of the bill as sent to us from the Senate, and provides for inserting the words "by set-off or otherwise;" so the section will then read:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections, by set-off or otherwise, made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia, or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto.

The insertion of those words was suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

The second amendment suggested by the committee is to strike out the third proviso of the original bill, which is as follows:

And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory, or any other person, to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent. All claims under the trust hereby created shall be filed with the governor of such State or Territory and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, within six years next after the passage of this act, and all claims not so filed shall be forever barred, and the money attributable thereto shall belong to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, respectively, as the case may be.

The committee supposed at that time, under the information possessed by it, it would be well enough to allow the States to take care of that business without undertaking to interfere with it. For that reason, and that alone, it was proposed to leave it with the States, but from information which came into the possession of the House it was determined to suggest the amendment to strike out this provision. I have called the attention of the committee to it merely for the purpose of saying that if this proposed amendment does not meet with their approbation there are reasons to vote it down and have the original proviso remain as in the Senate bill.

I see as the Chairman is lifting his gavel that my time is expired; I am through, substantially, however, with what I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted by the House for general debate has expired, and the Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by sections for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia, or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first recur on the amendment reported by the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the words "by set-off or otherwise:" so it will read:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections, by set-off or otherwise, made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia, or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, under the act of Congress," etc.

Mr. MCRAE. I move an amendment to the amendment by inserting, after the word "collections," the words "including penalties;" and I ask the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after the word "collections," the words "including penalties;" so that if amended it will read:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections, including penalties by set-off or otherwise," etc.

Mr. MCRAE. I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of the amendment. I presume the bill is intended to mean that in the Southern States where collections were enforced by judicial sale, under the amendatory act, and where certain penalties were attached, the same should also be repaid. To illustrate the point, I will state that there is a difference in the accounts as stated between the Government and the various States. In Arkansas there is a difference in this regard of some $40,000. The money was collected and paid in by way of penalties. Now, if this means a sum equal to all collections and penalties it is correct as it is, but in order to make certain that that is the intention of the bill, I would prefer to have the words inserted which I have suggested.

Mr. CASWELL. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment. This point was fully considered before the Judiciary Committee, and the amendment proposed by the committee, "by set-off or otherwise," was considered to cover every possible contingency. I see no necessity whatever, therefore, for the adoption of this amendment. If there was the least reason in the world I would be willing to accept it; but the words "by set-off or otherwise" cover the whole point.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not understand the objection to the amendment. If in the opinion of the gentleman from Wisconsin it is already covered by the phraseology of the bill, why does he object to inserting language that will make that clear beyond question?

I repeat that in stating the accounts between the Government and some of the States they have not credited the States with the penalties paid. We will find that fact running all through the accounts, and this amendment is in order to correct that inequality.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. MCRAE; and there were on a division—ayes 56, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary was adopted.

Mr. WALKER. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "credit to," in the fourth line, down to and including "persons," in line 8, and insert the following:

"Those States and Territories and the District of Columbia a sum equal to the aggregate amount of all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia, the said aggregate sum of collections to be divided by the present aggregate population of the States and Territories and the District of Columbia paying in the same and the rate per capita found; and when such rate shall be so determined, the Secretary of the Treasury shall credit and pay to each of said States and Territories and the District of Columbia an amount equal to the sum found by multiplying the present population of each of the said States and Territories and the District of Columbia by the per capita rate found; and it is further provided that the Secretary of the Treasury shall credit and pay to those States not assuming and paying the tax the amount collected from them by set-off or otherwise, or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons."

Mr. WALKER. I offer this amendment, Mr. Chairman, so as to provide that this bill shall do full justice, as I conceive it to be the object of the bill to do justice to those loyal States paying in or assuming the payment of this direct tax.

It is a well-known fact that a man living in New Hampshire, in 1861, and paying his proportion of this tax, having since removed to Nebraska or Kansas, and now aiding in the proposed repayment of the tax, would not get back the amount of the tax paid by him in 1861, and would have to pay into the Treasury by the present proposed repayment an additional sum. I can better illustrate this by some figures which I have at hand. Kansas, for instance, would receive under the bill, $71,743.33. Kansas would pay of this money ($17,500,000), now to be raised by taxation, $450,000, Nebraska $275,000, and Missouri $830,000.

If it is intended to refund only the amount paid under the act, and not the 15 per cent. commissions, Kansas would still pay $400,000, Nebraska $250,000, and Missouri $750,000. If my amendment is adopted, Missouri, having paid in $761,000, including the 15 per cent., would receive $930,000, while New Hampshire, having paid in $218,406.67, would receive $117,180. This illustrates the intention of the amendment.

It does seem to me that if justice is intended to be done to the people of the States and Territories paying in the money in 1861 the amendment ought to prevail.

The intention, I presume, of this measure is to refund certain moneys paid in by certain States, Territories, and individuals, and that it should be done by an equitable process, so that its payment would do equal justice as far as practicable to the various people in the United States who contributed the tax. Now, if the latter proposition is the one which is to receive the most consideration, and it certainly is the one that should receive it, then the amendment ought to be adopted. There are certain of the States, and I call the attention of their members on this floor to it, that will lose by this amendment. To the great States of Indiana and Illinois it will make but little difference, but to California, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Wisconsin and other of the States which have largely increased their population it makes a very material difference, as well as to all the Territories. The justice of the amendment will be manifest by a consideration of the fact that these States and Territories have largely increased their populations by the depletion of States in the Northeast, and the Northeastern States would lose therefore in proportion to the population lost, while the Western States would gain in the same proportion.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does the gentleman think that this money is to be paid to any individuals? If it is to be paid directly to the States by what right can you divert it from the purpose? If it is to be paid back it is not to be paid to anybody but the States that paid it.

Mr. WALKER. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio by asking this: What right have you to take seventeen and one-half millions out of the Treasury, being $400,000 paid by Kansas, $800,000 by Missouri, and $250,000 by Nebraska, and give it to New Hampshire, Maine, and other States? If the gentleman will answer that I will answer him.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Simply because we assessed all under the Constitution that could be assessed; that one party paid and the other did not.

Mr. SPINOLA and Mr. COX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York in front [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. SPINOLA. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COX. I propose to take up a few minutes. The constitutionality of this bill has already been elaborately argued. It is enough to know that it is a matter of doubtful constitutionality in order to vote against it. A matter of doubtful constitutionality is a matter of doubtful morality in the larger sense of that word; but this is a measure of doubtful morality in another sense, and on that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] dilated yesterday with cogency and illustration.

Although I am not a very old man I can recall very well the distribution which took place under the deposit act of 1836. I remember that in Ohio the money came there and was given to the county commissioners to distribute. They loaned it out to their favorites on bond and mortgage. Very little of it ever came back. It tended to demoralize in many senses.

Now, is there any doubt that by the direct tax of 1861 there was a valid collection of money into the Treasury? In regard to its constitutionality, and as to whether it was right to levy that direct tax, is there any question that the reception of that money was constitutional? But is it right to pay it out? That is another question. Certainly not if inequality results, for equality is the corner-stone of good government, and especially of good economy. Would there not result unequal distribution of this money to the States? Although New York may get two, or perhaps two and a quarter of a million dollars out of this fund returned to her, nevertheless there would be an inequality in its distribution that is not good morality in legislation or equity in its distribution.

Since 1836, the time of the deposit act; since 1861, the time of the direct-tax act; in fact, ever since the end of our Revolutionary war, there has never been an equality of burdens on the various States; and is it not too late now to recur to this business, rake up old accounts and distractions, and restate the accounts and embitter the distractions? It is the interest of the Republic and its citizens that these accounts should be considered closed and those harrowing associations mitigated. Time should work to a good end the rehabilitation of the people in contentment and brotherhood.

I lived in Ohio in 1861, when this tax was levied on the people I then represented, and perhaps on myself, to some extent. I moved to New York. We get something out of this bill for New York, but am I repaid at all or equally for what was paid in Ohio? By no means. My friend from Missouri has just shown the glaring inequality of the inevitable result of this bill; and that is an absurd and inequitable distribution of the moneys refunded.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, this project is immoral in the sense that I have used the expression. Because of the inequality in the distribution I will not vote for the measure. Why, if we can resuscitate all these matters, we can revive everything of a kindred nature from the beginning of the Government, including the taxation during the Revolutionary war, during the period of the war of 1812, and the burdens of the civil war. Why, sir, there were four billions of taxation, or of bonds, levied upon the people of this country for the civil conflict, without computing the consequential damages. There is no adequate human acumen to determine the varied burdens upon the many localities of this country. Therefore I say that inasmuch as we are changing and have changed the very body and personnel of our people since the time of the Revolution, since we have changed the conditions of our people and the sources of our taxes, we can not reach equality by any distribution to be made by this measure at this late day.

Why, if you are seeking equality in the distribution of those direct taxes, what about other taxes, what about your customs duties? Every one knows that by the very nature of the tariff as a revenue measure there can not be equality in the laying and collection of taxation by such measures. It can not be done owing to the multitude of the various conditions of our citizens and of our country. Owing to the distribution of our population, its constant locomotion, its changes from States to States, and from States to Territories, and from place to place, we can not possibly return this money so as to return the money to those who paid it to the Government; we can not reach equality; therefore, because of the doubtful constitutionality and doubtful morality of the bill and its results, and because of the glaring inequality, which is of its very essence, I will not vote for this measure, whatever may be determined by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. JACKSON and Mr. SPINOLA addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. JACKSON. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, there are some features of this debate which, it has occurred to me, it would be worth while to comment upon. I do not think it peculiar that we should have presented and argued with a great deal of persistency and argued with great ability the constitutional question, for we have been used to that. From the inauguration of the rebellion in 1861 all along down, upon every proposition to strengthen the hands of the Government or to sustain its arms we have always had to meet the question of unconstitutionality and illegality, and I care not to comment upon that now.

But I observe that this present question has been argued here as if the Government were about to adopt a policy of levying direct taxes and then returning them. This measure is opposed as if it were to be a precedent, as if we were to adopt it as a rule to be continually levying direct taxes and then returning them. Of course no such question is presented before us, and there is no need of meeting difficulties of that kind in this case. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the best plan to argue a case as plain as this one appears to me to be is simply to state it. We have here a definite proposition, a single case of wrong, and we need to provide the remedy for only this one particular case. There is, however, a line of argument which has been urged here that I wish to call attention to, not so much because it is argued in this particular case as because it seems to be a settled policy adopted by those of the other side who represent the cotton-growing States. It appears to be a general plan adopted to meet all questions that come up in our legislation here. It is this: Every proposition that is made, however just, however right, however it may involve binding obligations of the Government, is met by the proposition of these gentlemen that before they will allow us to enact it into law we must give their particular section some equivalent that they never could expect to get as an independent proposition. No matter what proposition is made by our side, the other side meet it and say, "We can not allow you to do that unless you will allow us so and so."

In this case the bill as reported by the committee is denounced as unconstitutional. But we can readily see how it can be made entirely satisfactory if we will adopt the amendments proposed and return the cotton tax.

If we propose to admit Dakota as a State, they say, "No; you can not do that unless you allow us to bring in New Mexico." If we propose to erect a public building in New York or in Philadelphia, or wherever the Government greatly needs it, they say, "No; you can not have that unless you give us public buildings also in Arkansas and in Texas." This line of policy was carried to an extreme here yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE], who says that he is in favor of doing justice and of equalizing matters between the States, but that he wants justice to go further back than this proposition, which only settles the direct tax, and his proposition is what? Why, he points to the money that has been paid for pensioning the Union soldiers; he counts up the immense sum, and he says, "I want justice done to the Southern States." How? From the contrast he draws the fair conclusion is that we should pension the men who fought against the Government. This seems to be the only logical conclusion from the gentleman's remarks. They answer us in this way on all occasions. You can not do anything now in the Congress of the United States unless you allow an equivalent to "our side."

Now, gentlemen, I undertake to say that it is time we should call a halt on that class of propositions. We hear a great deal about the "solid South," and we hear a great deal about sectionalism, but I want to say that it is you gentlemen on the other side who are keeping up that cry, and you alone are responsible for it. Do you suppose that you can keep one-third of the country—you will very soon be less than one-fourth—"solid" on such propositions, and that the other two-thirds—or three-fourths as it soon will be—will not remain solid in opposing them? Do you suppose, do you expect, that the people of this country will stand by and see the Government dishonored——

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes.

Mr. ENLOE. Did the gentleman say that the "gentleman from Tennessee," meaning me, said yesterday that the Confederate soldiers should be pensioned?

Mr. JACKSON. No, sir; I did not say so. I said that you said you were in favor of doing justice, and that one of the ways you proposed to do justice was to go back and rake over a great many things, and that then you called attention to the pension question and said in substance: "Look how much of that money goes to the North and how little to the South!" and I said that the logical conclusion from your argument was that you wanted "justice" done to the Confederate soldiers in that way. And, Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman has a bill, introduced in Congress and now pending, looking somewhat in that direction.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman does not understand any such thing if he understands the fact.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, what did you mean when you said that you wanted equality, and that so much money was appropriated for pensions, and that the North had got so much, and for three-quarters of a century was going to get it, and that your section was only getting a very small amount? What did you mean by this? What other meaning could it have beside the one I give it?

Mr. ENLOE. Do not strain yourself; you may explode. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JACKSON. What other soldiers than Confederate soldiers are there to be put in opposition to Union soldiers?

Mr. ENLOE. You have got too much in you, and you are trying to get it out too fast.

Mr. JACKSON. Well, I have the floor, and I have enough in me to meet the gentleman on that proposition or any other that he may present.

Mr. ENLOE. I want the gentleman to represent me correctly; he shall not misrepresent me; that is all there is about it. I do not propose to be misrepresented by any gentleman on this floor.

Mr. JACKSON. Let the gentleman make what he pleases of his statements yesterday. They are printed in the RECORD and can be read by any one. I only want to quote him fairly. He said he wanted these questions leveled up——

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman puts in my mouth any such language he misrepresents the facts, and he knows it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. ENLOE. I do not propose to let any man put in my mouth language which I did not use.

Mr. JACKSON. I am unable to hear the gentleman.

Mr. ENLOE. I am talking to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] has expired.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire now to make a few remarks myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] will be recognized next.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee if I can get the floor next.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SPINOLA. Provided I can follow the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will next recognize the gentleman's colleague. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir. I will offer a new amendment.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I was not in the House at the time the gentleman from Pennsylvania made the allusion to me, but my attention was called to the matter when I came in, and I was asked the question whether I had made any such statement as that I desired to pension the Confederate soldiers. I stated that I had not made any such statement, and that no legitimate deduction of that character could be drawn from any remarks which I had made; that it was a gratuitous and false construction of the language I had used. What I argued was that there were equities in this case, and that the people of the Southern States were contributing a much larger proportion of the taxes to the support of this Government than they were receiving in return. I assert that again, and no gentleman on this floor can successfully controvert the proposition. But did I say that I wanted to pension any Confederate soldiers? Did I use language which would bear any such construction?

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly I am willing to hear the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON. Did not the gentleman from Tennessee introduce a bill here to provide homes for Confederate soldiers at the national expense?

Mr. ENLOE. "The gentleman from Tennessee" did introduce, at the beginning of this Congress, a bill which proposed to donate, if the Legislature of the State would consent, the "Hermitage" in Tennessee, the home of Andrew Jackson, for the establishment of a home for disabled soldiers of the Federal and Confederate armies alike.

Mr. JACKSON. Ah!

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman now yield to me for a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Wait until I get through with this other gentleman; one at a time is as many as I want.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I introduced that bill upon the supposition that gentlemen here who have announced themselves in favor of extending the hand of friendship across the "bloody chasm" would be willing, if the State of Tennessee was disposed to join in the movement, to give the home of that patriot, soldier, and statesmen, Andrew Jackson, for the purpose of establishing such a home; that they would be willing to meet us upon half-way ground and do that. I want to say another thing: When I introduced that bill I was not prompted by any Confederate soldier. I want to say, furthermore, that no Confederate soldier from any portion of the South called upon me to introduce that bill. I suggested it myself, and it was done upon the idea that the time had come when these issues of the war should be buried, at least to that extent.

Mr. JACKSON. Did not this bill which the gentleman introduced propose to make an appropriation from the national Treasury for the purpose of erecting that building?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes; certainly it did. Now, what harm has that done to any State or to any individual? What harm can arise to this country from the adoption of it? What warrant does it give to the gentleman to charge me with the desire to pension Confederate soldiers from the Federal Treasury?

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEAR. Did it not provide that the superintendent of that home should be a Confederate soldier?

Mr. ENLOE. No; it did not. I proposed that General John T. Wilder should be the superintendent of that home, a soldier of the Union Army, who served under General Harrison. [Applause on the Democratic side of the House.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired, and debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. JACKSON. I withdraw my pro forma amendment, and move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I still insist that not only the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] himself by his statements made on the floor of this House yesterday, but also by the bill which he has introduced and by his own admissions here to-day fairly permits the conclusion to be drawn that he is in favor of equality between Confederate soldiers and Union soldiers, so far as their services are concerned. And it is to that proposition I take exception. The gentleman gets up here and disputes it and then confesses it.

Why, sir, I have only to read from the gentleman's speech made here yesterday, and which is printed in the RECORD this morning, to more than sustain what I have said. Let me read it.

Equality of burdens and equality of benefits is what we want.

That is what he said, as I see from his remarks made yesterday and printed this morning. He then continues:

Now let us look for a moment to the matter of pensions. The report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1888 shows that the Government has paid out on this account since the close of the war $963,086,444.72.

That is what he wants leveled and put on an equality. Does it lie in the mouth of a gentleman to dispute my statements who has a bill here now pending, asking a national appropriation for a soldiers' home to place on an equality, in caring for them, in Tennessee, soldiers of the Union and Confederate soldiers? Gentlemen, you are attempting to have the history of the country written up from 1861 to 1865 as though treason and rebellion were as honored as loyalty to the Government. But you can never do that. The North is not raising these questions. You are the men who are raising them here. We sit here day after day and month after month, and listen to speeches of this character, and but rarely any gentleman on this side replies. I propose to enter my objections here and now. I want the country to know that you are the men that introduce these questions in Congress and keep alive such issues as this. And I want to tell you further that you must fail in your attempts to change the history of the country. The people of this country and the civilized world will never agree, sir, that the men who brought on a causeless war and who raised a rebellion to perpetuate human slavery were right. [Applause.]

We are not asking them to make confessions here. All we ask of them is that they shall observe their parole, that they shall observe the laws of the land, that they shall put themselves on an equality with other people. Let the questions settled by the war remain settled forever. Let us have no more filibustering here or needless delays when bills are presented to do justice to the people who were loyal to the country. I hope soon to see the Government do justice to the soldiers who saved its existence. And if I may be permitted to do so, I will also express the hope that no representative in Congress will ever use as an argument against granting pensions to Union soldiers the fact that the money goes largely to the Northern and Western States. Never let us hear suggestions, as the gentleman says, that there is need of having equality done upon this question between the different States or between Union and Confederate soldiers. Too much in the past has gone unchallenged on this subject. And that is the reason why I have spoken in reference to these matters.

Now, that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to have printed as a part of my remarks the bill H. R. 1849, which was introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] in the House of Representatives on January 4, 1888. It is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1849) to provide for the location and erection in Tennessee of a branch home for disabled soldiers of the late war, Federal and Confederate, and other wars.

Be it enacted, etc., That the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to locate, establish, construct, and permanently maintain a branch of said National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in the State of Tennessee; and that the sum of $150,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the said board of managers and by them expended in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the regular and volunteer forces of the United States in any of its wars, and all honorably discharged or paroled soldiers and sailors who served in the army or navy of the late so-called Confederate States, who are disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise, and who have no adequate means of support, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning their living, shall be entitled to be admitted to said home for disabled volunteer soldiers, subject to such similar regulations to those prescribed for admission to existing branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

SEC. 3. That as soon after the approval of this act as practicable, the said board of managers shall secure the necessary lands and commence the erection of suitable buildings for the use of said branch: Provided, That the said board of managers may accept, by donation from the State of Tennessee, the property known as the Hermitage, the late home of Andrew Jackson, as a site for said branch home herein provided for.

SEC. 4. That General John T. Wilder, of Chattanooga, Tenn., be, and he is hereby, appointed a manager of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to serve for five years after the passage of this act; and hereafter the number of managers of the said home, elected by Congress, shall be eleven instead of ten, as at present, one of whom shall be a resident of one of the late so-called Confederate States.

Mr. SPINOLA was recognized.

Mr. OATES. Before the gentlemen from New York proceeds I trust that he, with other gentlemen who participate in this debate, will bear in mind that by order of the House at 4 o'clock this bill is to be reported back with such amendments as may be agreed upon, and I appeal to them, therefore, not to get up any political discussion on this question.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, the debate has taken a very broad turn in the last few minutes, and has traveled far outside of the real question at issue before us. I shall not now make any allusion to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JACKSON] who has just taken his seat, although at some future time it may be that I shall pay my respects to him, as well as to some of his associates.

I am here to-day, sir, as one of the representatives of the State of New York, who at the commencement of this discussion was favorable to the passage of this bill. But after having sat here for two days and listened to the debates for and against, I have come to the conclusion that I can not vote for the measure. [Applause.]

Now, sir, in the first place, the direct tax was legally levied, legally collected, and legally paid into the Treasury of the United States, as well as legally taken therefrom and disbursed according to the provisions of the law authorizing it; and the able and distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] in the discussion this morning—the gentleman who is leading the other side of the House on this question—has admitted in the course of the debate that there is no warrant in the Constitution to refund this tax.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman permit me there——

Mr. SPINOLA. There being no warrant in the Constitution to return it, as admitted by its own friends, therefore I am forced to vote against it.

Mr. CASWELL. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that understanding of what I have said. He misunderstood me.

Mr. SPINOLA. I have but a few moments, and must decline to be interrupted.

Mr. CASWELL. What I said was that there was no express warrant.

Mr. SPINOLA. Very well, let the gentleman correct it in that manner if he will; let him put in "express warrant," if he sees proper. I do not see that it alters the condition. General Jackson never recognized any such thing when he was administering the government of this country. I stand here to-day, sir, firmly, flatly, broadly on the provisions of the Constitution which our fathers created for our guidance and action. Standing upon the provisions of the Constitution, I propose, as far as I possibly may, under the oath that I have taken here, to support and maintain the Constitution, and to adhere as strictly to that fundamental law as lies within my power; and I do not propose to be diverted or to diverge one iota from that under any circumstances or because of any pretext that may be presented here. [Applause.]

The question presented by this bill and now pending before this committee is one of the most dangerous, in my judgment, that has ever been before Congress since I have been a member of this body.

It is one of the most dangerous because it proposes to open the door in the future to every species of extravagance and for the payment of every demand of a similar character that may be made. There is no politician in this House or outside of it to-day in this country who can foresee what ten years may bring forth. With the example set and the precedent established by the passage of this bill before this Congress and the country, within ten years I venture to predict that the cotton tax will be restored, and it will be justified because of the precedent established here to-day. The internal-revenue taxes collected upon everything, the taxes collected upon manufactured articles, running up into the hundreds of millions of dollars, will be refunded if we open the door by the passage of this dangerous class of legislation. I am opposed, therefore, to its passage.

Why, sir, the Constitution of the United States would not permit us to appropriate a dollar of money for the erection of a public building in a State to be used exclusively for the State; and yet this money is to be taken from the Treasury of the Government and given to the States for just such purposes as that. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was so alarmed for fear that the Confederate soldiers might be paid bounties or taken care of by the General Government, should remember that if this money goes back to the State of Tennessee, if this bill shall become a law and the $400,000 should be paid to that State, it will go into their treasury, to be appropriated for just such objects as they choose. Does my friend wish to give them the privilege of doing that? Does he wish them to appropriate it for the benefit of the Confederate soldiers? I think not. If he does, I do not. I should not vote a dollar from the public Treasury to take care of the Confederate soldiers, and that is another reason why I shall vote against this bill. The thirteen Southern States of the Confederacy contributed to the creation of this fund, and when the money goes back to them it goes into their State treasuries, to be used when, how, and as the States may please. It goes there for what purpose?

Mr. O'FERRALL. To be paid to the individuals who paid it.

Mr. SPINOLA. That is not possible. Nor could it be paid to their representatives. You can not find them. They are scattered to all parts of the country, and the men who paid it can not be found. Many of them are not living, and some even have left no heirs. I say, then, that when this money is paid into the treasury of the State of Tennessee, that State not being able to find the men who paid the tax originally, can appropriate it to any purpose they please. They can build a soldiers' home for the Confederate soldiers and pay it out as they choose. Have the Confederate soldiers asked us for pensions? No. They know that they are not entitled to them, and would not receive them at our hands if any asked for them. But the States of the South can aid them with this fund. Upon all grounds, therefore, that I can suggest, Mr. Chairman, taking the broad views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania also in that same connection, I find nothing to justify me to vote for this bill. And let me tell our friends on the other side of the House, who claim to be the special friends of the soldiers of the Union, that when they go home after having voted here to sustain this measure and pay over this money to the Southern States, they will have an account to settle with the veterans of the Union Army, who will want to know why they paid money to those States to be so used.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, one of the principal objections urged against the action proposed in this bill is, that where a tax has been levied and partly collected, and that part disbursed, and the Treasury holds a surplus largely in excess of its needs, and which renders it amply able to refund the part collected, and there is nothing to prevent the collection of the remainder of the tax uncollected except the fact that the necessity of the collection no longer exists, the General Government, to which the power to levy and collect has been intrusted by the people, has not the constitutional right to refrain from collecting such remainder, nor to refund the portion already collected.

In the face of such an objection is it not pertinent to inquire what would be the position of gentlemen who urge it in case the proposition was to compel the payment of the unpaid remainder of the direct tax? Would we not expect them to say as an objection to that course, "There is no need of the money, and your proposed action is unjust and oppressive?"

But, Mr. Chairman, is it true that the power which may levy and collect a tax may not constitutionally refund that tax when it is able and willing to do so?

Judge Cooley, than whom no clearer writer or abler jurist, in my opinion, graces the legal world of this Union to-day, in his admirable treatise upon the subject of taxation, at page 753, says:

A general right exists in the State to refund any tax collected for its purposes.

And I apprehend by the term "State" he intends to refer to the body of people exercising sovereign powers, and to whom is confided the power of taxation by the constitution, whether State or national.

It will be admitted by those urging this constitutional objection, that, constitutionally, if a tax is levied and collected, and is used by the Government at all, it must be applied to the purpose or purposes for which it was laid. And I suppose they will also admit that the tax must be uniform in its application; that is, it must have such uniformity at least as will enable it to come within the terms of that constitutional demand, as defined by the courts, that requires that—

All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

And it must also fall in line with that other constitutional provision which inhibits the laying of any "capitation or other direct tax * * * unless in proportion to the census or enumeration" directed to be taken each ten years. And the tax thus laid must be paid by the States upon which it falls, or there is no uniformity.

Now, suppose that it be true, as a proposition of constitutional law, that no power to refund a tax inheres in and belongs as an incident to the power to levy and collect as conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government. We would find ourselves then in this case in this anomalous position:

A direct tax of $20,000,000 levied upon the several States of the Union by the General Government in the exercise of its constitutional power. Of this amount $15,227,632.03, collected and paid by a portion of the States (to which must be added $2,206,985.67 paid as commissions for collecting), and leaving uncollected $2,562,401.29.

No necessity whatever existing for the collection of this unpaid portion.

A large surplus of useless and unused money now lying idle in the Treasury.

A surplus sufficient, many times, in amount to enable the Government to refund that portion of the direct tax already collected, without in any way interfering with the proper discharge of its other obligations. And yet in the face of these facts, if gentlemen would be consistent, they must hold that to preserve the principle of uniformity, the Government must go on and collect this unpaid portion; that it must add this further amount to the unused and idle sums now in the vaults of the Treasury or loaned to the various banks throughout the country.

Because the Government had once started on the road and had obtained and used a portion of the money authorized to be collected, it dare not let go of that part and must not refrain from collecting the rest, although absolutely unneeded, because that would destroy the principle of uniformity. In other words, you have the constitutional right to levy the tax. But if the necessity for the levy has passed away before the tax is entirely collected you can not then stop, but must go on and collect even though you have no need of the money whatever. For gentlemen will hardly argue that where a portion of the States have paid, another portion should not be required to pay. Certainly so unjust a proposition is repugnant to the sense of fairness and equity possessed by every fair-minded man.

Mr. Chairman, I am of those who believe that good constitutional law is consistent with the dictates of ordinary good hard sense, and the good hard sense of the present situation is to pay back to the Statse that have paid this tax the several amounts by them placed in the national Treasury, to refrain from collecting the unpaid portion of the levy, and thus place all the States upon an equal footing respecting it, and not compel the unnecessary and useless increase of the money in the Treasury which would result from a contrary course. For in this case the Government, in order to be fair and equal with all of the States, must either go forward or backward. There is no standing still. It must stretch out its strong hand and take more, or it must open its purse and let go of that which it has already taken.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not had time, since they were proposed and printed in the RECORD for the information of members, to critically examine the various amendments which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has indicated he will offer to this bill.

But one of those amendments which proposes to set off against the sums due to the several States by the terms of this bill, the amounts due from those States to the General Government by reason of the deposit with them of public moneys under the act of June 23, 1836, I have examined to some extent, and it seems to me the proposition amounts to an invitation to those States to enter into a trade with the General Government whereby the States swap a hundred-dollar dog for two fifty-dollar pups.

Let me illustrate. There was deposited of this public money, under the act of 1836, with the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Arkansas, which for convenience I will designate as "Group I," the sum of $8,506,960.53, which sum they still hold. This same group of States yet owe on account of the direct tax the sum of $2,284,105.18.

There was also deposited of this public money with the States of Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, which I will designate as "Group II," the sum of $12,808,232.73, which they still hold. But this group has paid on account of the direct tax the sum of $8,428,875.95. Now suppose the bill passes, amended so as to permit the set-off proposed, how would it leave the two groups of States standing as compared with each other?

"Group I" not having paid the direct tax, would have nothing to receive and nothing to set off, and would still hold the eight and a half million dollars of public money, and would have failed to pay the two and a quarter million dollars of direct tax apportioned to it. In other words, it would make a total sum, in exact figures, of $10,791,065.71, by holding what it has, and refusing to pay what it as justly owes as did any of the States.

While "Group II" having paid the direct tax heretofore, would be required to refund, of this public money deposited with them, the sum of $8,428,875.95, and would still hold on that account $5,016,-123.61. In other words, these eight great Northern States would lose by the transaction as compared with the eight Southern States the sum of $5,774,942.10, and leaving the States that did not pay the direct tax just the amount of the last-named sum better off, because of their dereliction, than would be the States in "Group II" that did pay.

Now how can gentlemen call that a just or equitable proposition? It would seem that whatever may be the ideas of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] regarding the inability of the General Government to refund the direct tax, he has no doubt about the entire legality and justice of requiring those States that paid it to now shell out their deposits of public money, leaving the States that did not pay to still hold and enjoy the amounts of that same public money which they with the other States have held since 1837. In other words, "Group I" shall neither pay nor refund, while "Group II" shall both pay and refund.

Again, these deposits of public money were made under a law which provided in substance:

First. That the deposits should be fixed, as to amount to go to each State, by that State's representation in the House and Senate, thus making it equal in distribution.

Second. That it should be refunded upon the demand of the General Government in a certain way, to wit:

(a) That ratable proportions should, when needed, be called from the several States (not from a portion of them).

(b) That it should only be called for in sums not exceeding $10,000 from any one State in any one month unless thirty days' previous notice had been given, and then only in sums not exceeding $20,000 at any one call.

This proposed amendment would not only be unequal and unjust, but it would violate the contract under which the States accepted the deposits.

It would seem that gentlemen in their frantic desire to escape the logic of their position, and to hold what they have already appropriated, are willing to violate a specific statute and a binding contract. They would consent to a positive wrong in order to avoid a fancied violation of a constitutional provision, which exists only in imagination.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the Constitution was framed to enforce, not to prevent, equality between the States and citizens. But, sir, this nation is no stranger to the fact that in every attempt to enforce that equality the Constitution has been invoked to prevent its enforcement. There are always men to be found who can twist some meaning out of some clause or sentence of that revered instrument to assist them in preventing some right action or in strangling some good intent. But it is not often that so palpable an injustice is invoked to render assistance in preventing action and saving the Constitution as the amendment under consideration. It ought to be voted down; and this bill, as it came to us from the Senate, ought to be passed, for it does no injustice, it creates no inequality, it violates no provision of the Constitution, but it is inherently just and right.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill, and for these reasons: The money, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, may reach the places from which it was paid in lump to the Government, but it can not find its way to the pockets from which it was first taken. If returned to the State treasuries it will benefit hundreds of thousands who never were directly or indirectly taxed to pay a cent of it. It will benefit hundreds of thousands who were citizens of foreign countries when the taxes were collected.

The money is now in the Treasury of the United States. The United States has a far better claim to it than those who are to profit by scattering it. It took it from the pockets of the people. It can not return it to the original pockets, and it has no right to pay it into other pockets. Much of the money came from the earnings of artisans and mechanics. If paid back into the State treasuries, artisans and mechanics will not be benefited by it. As the gentleman from Michigan justly observed, it will be used to relieve the taxes on real estate, and the Astors and those who own the most real estate will derive the most benefit. The poor man will be left. The proposition thus virtually allows the United States to take money from the pockets of the poor and turn it into the pockets of the rich.

It is claimed that the money should be returned because certain States paid the tax while others failed to do so. The States that failed to pay it, however, paid a special tax amounting to $67,000,000 on a product cultivated exclusively within their borders. This bill carries a little over a fifth of that sum.

If one tax is returned, it is difficult to see why the other should not be returned, after deducting what is due from the recusant States on the direct tax. The same line of argument must apply to both taxes.

Reverse the situation. Suppose a special tax on wheat, cheese, butter, or any other Northern or Western product had been levied as the tax on cotton was levied, and a bill for the return of the cotton tax had been presented, I can easily fancy what a cry would have been raised if the tax on wheat, cheese, and butter had not been included in the bill. The waving of the bloody shirt would not have been a marker.

I know that the passage of this bill will put over $2,000,000 into the treasury of the State of New York, but if unconstitutionally done it would injure the State far more than it would benefit it. The people of New York, sir, expect their representatives to stand by the courage of their convictions, independent of personal considerations. I shall stand by mine.

I shall vote against the bill because I can find no constitutional warrant for it. I shall vote against it because I am estopped from voting for it. I own a bit of real estate in New York, and I am debarred from voting for a bill in which I have a direct pecuniary interest. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Last of all, I shall vote against it because it is establishing a precedent that may work incalculable damage to the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall condense in a small compass what I desire to say in regard to this bill.

At the last session I gave this measure my earnest support, and during the long and weary deadlock, resulting from the persistent efforts of gentlemen to defeat it by obstructive tactics, I believe I was ever at my post insisting upon the right of a majority upon a measure of this character to have a direct vote. Reflection since then has only strengthened me in the opinions I then had and in my determination to vote for the bill substantially as it came from the Senate.

Sir, the discussion which has been going on yesterday and to-day has taken a scope far too wide, and language has been used uncalled for and unjustified by the subject under consideration.

And what is this bill and what are the facts which have led up to its introduction?

In 1861 the Government of the United States levied a tax upon the whole country, North and South, for war purposes, and apportioned it among all the States.

To Virginia, the State which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor, she apportioned the sum of $729,071.02; to the other States embraced in the Southern Confederacy she apportioned as follows:

Alabama, $529,313.33; Arkansas, $261,886; Florida, $77,522.67; Georgia, $584,367.33; Louisiana, $385,886.67; Mississippi, $413,084.67; North Carolina, $576,194.67; South Carolina, $363,579.67; Tennessee, $669,498; and Texas, $729,071.02.

This tax was not paid by any of the Southern States as States; but the following sums were collected by the Federal tax-gatherers from certain individuals in these various States:

In Alabama, nothing; Arkansas, $154,701.18; Florida, $4,766.26; Georgia, $82,427.47; Louisiana, $314,500.84; Mississippi, $69,584.55; North Carolina, $377,452.61; South Carolina, $222,396.36; Tennessee, $392,004.48; Texas, $180,841.51; and Virginia, $442,408.09.

It will be observed that the citizens of Virginia paid far more than the citizens of any other Southern State; that Alabama paid nothing, Florida less than $5,000, while a number of States paid comparatively little.

After the payment of the sums I have just mentioned there still remained as an existing, living charge which could be enforced at any time the following sums:

Alabama, after deducting some offsets, $525,078.12; Arkansas, $107,184.82; Florida, $72,756.41; Georgia, after giving her credit with a claim she has against the Government, $466,384.44; Louisiana, $71,385.14; Mississippi, $341,213.12; North Carolina, $198,742.06; South Carolina, $141,174.31; Tennessee, $277,493.52; Texas, $174,265.16; Virginia, $286,662.93.

To these sums must be added the heavy penalty for non-payment fixed by the levying act and possibly interest; so that Virginia, after her citizens had paid $442,408.09, paid it, too, at a time when they had to make great sacrifices and almost sell their seed-corn to do it, must still have resting over her as a menacing obligation to the Government largely more than a half million of dollars. As one of the representatives of the people who paid this money, as one of the representatives of a State resting under a charge of far more than $500,000, which was liable to be enforced any time, I have hailed with delight this bill as a measure through which the money thus paid can be refunded to those whose energies were strained to the uttermost to meet the demands of the Government nearly a quarter of a century ago, or their legal representatives, and my State, now burdened to her utmost capacity with taxation, can be relieved of the charge to which I have just alluded, which, like a miserable ghost, has been ever rising up before her.

Now, I ask again, what is this bill? It is a bill which proposes to refund to all the States and Territories and the District of Columbia all sums collected as direct taxes under the act approved August 5, 1861, and where it was paid by the citizens thereof to refund directly to them or to their legal representatives, and to remit and relinquish all moneys still due to the United States on the quota apportioned to the respective States and Territories and the District of Columbia.

It provides that all claims of citizens must be filed with the governor of the State or Territory and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, within six years after its passage, and that all claims not so filed shall be forever barred, and the money attributable thereto shall belong to such State, Territory, and the District of Columbia, respectively, as the case may be. I have quoted from the language of the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is there in this measure to call forth the violent opposition which it has been meeting in this House?

Equality is equity, and the burdens of taxation should fall alike upon all. Was it right to collect from the people of Virginia hundreds of thousands of dollars for governmental purposes and allow the people of Alabama to escape without the payment of a dollar? Was it right to visit the wasted fields and desolated homes of my State and draw from the little substance left her by the hoof of war large sums of money and exempt other States no worse situated from the raid of the Federal tax-gatherer? What had Virginia done, what had her people done, that she and her people should be compelled to respond to the tax demand of the Government, while Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, and Texas were never forced to respond at all, or if at all, only in small measure?

Equality, I repeat, is equity, and the States that did not pay as much in proportion to their assessments as other States ought to be required by the Government to come up now on equal ground or all should be put on an equality by refunding to all the amounts paid.

It seems to me, sir, the Government can not "poise the cause in justice' equal scales" unless it shall pursue one of the two courses I have marked out.

Which is the better course? This bill has adopted it. With a Treasury plethoric with gold and overflowing with the money of the people, drawn from them and from their hard earnings largely in excess of Government demands, it is right that no more shall be taken from any State or section if it can be avoided and the ends of equality and justice attained. It is in this spirit that this bill has been framed.

It draws no money from any State or people. It creates no burden; it sends out no tax-gatherer. It oppresses none, but relieves all resting under the obligation imposed, and it blesses those upon whom the Government laid its hand by returning to them the money collected from them and inflicts no wrong upon any citizen of this great country.

It is hard for me to conceive of any measure which, in my judgment, could carry with it more fairness or equity.

I have heard it said that this money, if the bill should pass, will never reach the parties who paid it. In my own district, sir, I know many who, in agony and almost in rags, with their lands beaten down by the tramp of armies, fences gone and buildings destroyed, with scarcely a beast with which to drive a furrow, paid this tax, and who still live and have burning in their brain the recollections of those times. I know that many of them have passed away, but they have left behind them those who will cherish this act upon the part of the Government as an act of simple and exact justice to them as children and heirs.

But suppose some portion of this fund should never be claimed; in that event it will go into the State treasury and prove a blessing to the whole people of the State by relieving them to that extent from State taxation, or enabling them, if they should so elect, to donate it to charitable or educational purposes.

I have now said all that I desire upon the bill as it came from the Senate. I want now to refer to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to refund the tax known as the cotton tax.

All my natural inclinations have been to favor this amendment, and I have listened as attentively as possible to all that has been said in advocacy of it, hoping that I might see my way clear to support it; but as the discussion has advanced and the more I have considered it the farther I have found my judgment leading me away from it.

It is insisted that if the direct tax is refunded, the cotton tax ought also to be refunded. To this proposition I can not assent. The direct tax was a tax on land and created a charge on it, and was paid by the land-owner; there was no escaping it; when he paid it, the loss fell directly on him; it did not increase the value of his land, but made him that much poorer; there was no source from which he could be reimbursed; his money was gone, forever gone.

Not so with the cotton tax. It was a tax on raw cotton, an article of merchandise, and it naturally and necessarily entered into the price and increased it.

If the cotton-planter paid the tax, he got it back when he sold to the cotton-buyer, and the buyer got it back when he sold to the manufacturer, and when the manufacturer made it up into a fabric he got it back when he sold the fabric to the wholesale dealer, and the wholesale dealer when he sold to the retail dealer, and the retail dealer got it back when he sold it to the consumer; so the consumer was the man who was affected and not the cotton-planter.

This is in the line of the theory I have advanced as a tariff reformer. I have insisted, and so has every tariff reformer I have heard, that the tariff is a tax upon the consumer, and I can not draw any distinction between a tax levied directly upon the raw material, as was the cotton tax, and indirectly, as is the tariff tax.

Then this amendment proposes, it seems to me, to refund to the wrong man; the planter has already been reimbursed; the consumer is the man who paid the piper and not the man who grew the cotton. It is impossible to reach the consumers, and therefore they must continue to bear the loss which they sustained by the increased price they were required to pay for their clothing and cotton goods.

Again, sir, if the cotton tax should be refunded, why should not all the tobacco tax which has been paid since the war be refunded? Where is the difference in principle? Tobacco is a product of the soil as much as cotton, and a tax on it is as much a tax on agriculture as the tax on cotton.

Virginia's tobacco-planters have paid to the United States Government since 1865 more than $100,000,000 upon their product, and they occupy before the law as high a position and are entitled to as much consideration as the cotton-planters of the cotton States. They are not seeking a refunding of these millions which they have thus paid, but they do ask that they, as well as all others who were drained of their substance to meet the direct tax, shall have it returned.

One word more and I shall have finished. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] should, in my opinion, be adopted without a dissenting voice. Surely a just Government will not hesitate to right so great a wrong done to a weak and powerless class of citizens. Surely this Government will not seek to speculate upon the misfortunes of some of its own people by buying their property at a mere song for a debt they were too poor to pay and then sell the property at forty times the amount it paid and hold on to the sale-money. I understand the Government, at a direct-tax sale, bid in houses and lands at a few thousand dollars, then sold these houses and lands for hundreds of thousands, and turned the original owners out without a shingle over their heads or a foot of ground upon which to rest their feet.

If these people were made to feel the heavy hand of the taxing power, if they were deprived of home and shelter, because of the misfortunes of that unfortunate period in our history, which will ever be recorded as the four years of the nation's calamity, let the Government not retain the hoarded thousands and hundreds of thousands which it received above the amount which constituted its lien. It should be content with receiving the tribute it had levied, and should not desire to inflict suffering and misery or speculate upon misfortune and poverty.

I hope this amendment will be adopted, and that the bill as amended will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the constitutionality of this bill. That has been done so clearly and fully by others that in my brief time I could add but little on that point.

The purpose of this measure is to pay back to the States a large sum of money to which, in my judgment, they have no right in law, equity, or morals. The following table will show the amounts paid by each

State and the sums still due under the operation of what was called the direct-tax act of 1861:

L. W. REID, Acting Register.

It is contended by the friends of the bill that those States which paid should be reimbursed because all did not pay their quotas in full. This is really the only reason seriously urged for its passage. No one in this debate or elsewhere has yet questioned the legality or the constitutionality of the direct tax. It was legally laid and collected, and if you can take this money out of the Treasury to refund this tax it is equivalent to a declaration that the power exists to repay any and all of the taxes paid by the people of the North during the war. The income tax, the internal-revenue taxes were legal and constitutional, but during the war they were only paid by the citizens of such of the States as were within the Union lines; therefore the same reason might with equal propriety be urged for their repayment.

It is to equalize the burdens of the war between the States, they say. I ask why the rich State of New York should now be paid $2,213,330.86 because she contributed that amount twenty-seven years ago to the national Treasury under the direct-tax act of 1861 to carry on the war? If this is justice and equality why is it not equally just to tax the people to-day to reimburse the cities and counties which impoverished their treasuries by raising money to pay bounties to Union soldiers? Why is it not equally just to refund to the citizens of the North what they paid for substitutes to do their fighting? To me one seems to be as just as the other; and if we begin here may we not expect to see succeeding Congresses go to this extent?

The fact has been cited in support of this bill that sums of money have been repaid to Pennsylvania and to other States which taxed themselves and equipped and sent out troops to the war. The repayment of those debts was constitutional and proper, because they were contracted by the States in their sovereign and individual capacity for the protection and general welfare of all, and it was not just that the burden should fall more heavily on the people of one State because of their greater energy and activity for the general defense than on all.

But this tax is of an entirely different kind. It was a national tax, levied on and apportioned among all the States by Congress as required by the Constitution, and because the Northern or loyal States did pay their respective part in full, while the Southern States, which were then out of the Union and beyond the control of Congress, did not pay their quotas, affords no lawful excuse or right under the Constitution for refunding any part of this tax. To refund it is to give to the States a gratuity; to pay something which the Government is under no obligation moral or legal to pay.

On this point I may be pardoned for quoting to our friends on the other side of the House no less an authority than the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who, when this bill was under discussion in the Senate last January, said:

> The committee thought, in the first place, that there is no obligation on the part of the United States to pay back this money to any one. Nobody has contended that the United States is indebted either to these States or to the citizens who paid the tax; it is simply a voluntary movement on the part of the United States to pay back this money out of the Treasury, to place that which has been paid by the States themselves in the treasuries of the States, and to pay to the States whose citizens have contributed toward this direct tax the amount that they have paid, leaving it to the States to say whether or not this payment to the State whose citizens have paid a portion of the money creates a trust or an obligation which they will be bound to provide for and see to the distribution of.
> There is no obligation against the Government or against a State to pay back to the particular individual the tax paid by him—not the slightest legal obligation, scarcely a moral obligation; but that is a question for the State to determine. Some of its citizens have paid this tax and some have not. To the extent that that creates an obligation on the State in receiving this money to its citizens, it is in the nature of a trust or duty; no obligation, however, because the money was legally paid and each citizen only paid his share of the tax levied under the act of the United States through the direct-tax commissioners.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] has said this is a question as to whether the sums paid by the loyal States shall be returned to them without interest or whether the delinquent States shall be made to pay the balances still due from them with interest for twenty-seven years. I am far from being alarmed by that threat.

You have not now—you will never have in any Congress—the power or the votes necessary to force the collection of those unpaid balances. There is no authority to collect them in either the executive or the judicial branch of the Government. That power rests alone with Congress; and were you to attempt to exert it the outraged sense of justice and humanity in the civilized world would cry, "Shame upon you!" You know that this direct tax is not, and has never been, a debt against any Southern State in its capacity as a State. It is not a debt against a State until assumed by the Legislature of the State. No Legislature in any Southern State ever assumed the debt. The Supreme Court has decided in the case of The United States vs. Louisiana that it was not a debt of Louisiana and that the Government could not charge against it amounts due to that State. The following is the opinion of the court:

> Nor do we regard the unpaid portion of the direct tax laid by the act of Congress of August 5, 1861, which was apportioned to Louisiana, as constituting any debt to the United States by the State in her political and corporate character, which can be set off against her demands. (12 Stat., 292, chap. 45.) That act imposed an annual direct tax of twenty millions "upon the United States, and apportioned it to the several States of the Union." It directed that the tax should "be assessed and laid on the value of all lands and lots of ground, with their improvements and dwelling houses." (Sec. 13.) It was assessed and laid upon the real property of private individuals in the States. Public property of the States and of the United States was exempted from the tax. Its apportionment was merely a designation of the amount which was to be levied upon and collected from this property of individuals in the several States, respectively. The provisions of the act are inconsistent with any theory of the obligation of the States to pay the sums levied. It provides for the appointment of officers to assess the property to the different holders, and to collect the tax, and directs with minute detail the proceedings to be taken to enforce the collection, either by a distraint and sale of the personal property of the owners, or, that failing, by a sale of the real property taxed. It allows, it is true, the different States to assume the amounts apportioned to them, respectively, and to collect the same in their own way by their own officers. Many of the States did thus assume the amounts, and in such cases it may well be considered that for the sums assumed they became debtors to the United States, and, so far as any portion of those sums has not been paid, that they still remain debtors. But, unless such assumption was had, no liability attached to any State in her political and corporate character. The liability was upon the individual land-owners within her limits. The act declares that the amount of the taxes assessed "shall be and remain a lien upon all lands and other real estate of the individuals who may be assessed for the same during two years after the time it shall annually become due and payable." (Sec. 33.) Louisiana never assumed the payment of taxes apportioned to her, or of any portion of them. She allowed the Government to proceed by its officers to collect the tax from the property-holders. The amount apportioned to her was $385,886.67; the amount collected from the owners of land was $314,500.84; leaving only a balance of $71,385.83. It is not for us to suggest in what way this balance may be collected. After the war the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to suspend the collection of the tax in any of the States previously declared in insurrection until January, 1868, and subsequently this authority was extended to January, 1869. (14 Stat., 331, sec. 14; 15 Stats., 260, chap. 69.) The Secretary acted upon this authority and suspended the collection. It is stated that since 1869 no attempts have been made by the executive department to enforce its collection in those States. Be that as it may, it is enough for the disposition of the present case that the unpaid balance of the tax apportioned to Louisiana constitutes no debt on the part of the State in her political and corporate character to the United States.

This tax was a charge against the real estate of the tax-payers in the States. It was to be collected by the United States direct-tax commissioners, and was a lien on the real estate for two years. The lien has expired, the enforcement of the law for the collection of the tax has been indefinitely suspended, and the threat that Tennessee may be called on to pay the $277,493.52, which the books of the Treasury show to be still due from her, has no terrors for me. You say it is necessary to pay this money back in order to balance the books of the Treasury. If that is all, why not close the books and balance the accounts by forgiving the Southern States the amounts charged against them? This would be magnanimous; this would be generous. You call this a measure to equalize the burdens of the war. By the bill you pay to the wealthiest States of the Union about fifteen millions which the Government does not owe them, for which they have no sort of legal claim against the Government. But you close the doors of the Treasury against the man who lost his all in the track of war; you turn your back upon the schools, colleges, and churches which were used as hospitals or laid in ashes to be scattered by the winds of heaven, and tell them their claims are just and equitable, but there is danger that the Treasury might give out if such claims were paid.

Gentlemen speak of equalizing the burdens of the war as if the Southern States had lost nothing by the war. It is as impossible to equalize the burdens of the war as it would be for you by Congressional enactment to bring back to life the thousands of brave men who fell in that struggle. Can you ever rebuild the dwellings, barns, and fences, yea, the cities, that went up in the smoke which marked the track of contending armies? Can you restore the wasted fortunes of those whose accumulations of a century to the amount of more than a thousand millions were wiped out by the stroke of the pen which signed the proclamation of emancipation? Can you replenish the treasuries of States which were saddled with debts of millions and carried to the verge of ruin by the carpet-bag governments which immediately succeeded the war?

I know the States that adhered to the Union, and in some instances their citizens, sustained serious losses and incurred heavy debts, but at the same time the Government was paying out among your people millions of money and nearly a billion in bonds for food and clothing and supplies for the armies, and, on the whole, your people grew rich and prosperous, and their prosperity is evident to us to-day.

Why prate about equalizing the burdens of the war? That is an empty subterfuge, a flimsy cloak to cover the wickedness of this nefarious scheme. Acknowledge the whole truth. Is not this bill but another of those devices to drain the Treasury, to exhaust the surplus, and to avoid the necessity for any revision of the tariff and reduction of taxation?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, so long as by one subterfuge or another the power of Congress to appropriate money can be exercised—no matter what the object for which the appropriation is asked—just so long can the day for a reduction of surplus revenue and a curtailment of unnecessary and unjust taxation be postponed.

Does any one suppose for a moment that this bill would have been brought forward if there were no apparent surplus in the Treasury? Would any advocate of this bill urge the levying of another direct tax of seventeen and one-half millions to refund this one, on the ground that this had not all been paid? I apprehend not. Yet, if this bill be constitutional, there is no question about the power of Congress to raise the money by any methods and powers of taxation authorized by the Constitution. If the funds to pay this sum are taken from the Treasury other money must be raised either by internal revenue or by duty on imports to supply the place of the seventeen and a half millions thus drawn out.

In reality we have no surplus in the Treasury. So long as the Government owes an interest-bearing bond outstanding we have no surplus-strictly speaking, and all money in the Treasury not needed for meet, ing the actual expenses of the Government administered on principles of the strictest economy ought to be applied to the extinguishment of our bonded debt. This is not a parallel case to that of 1836. We then had an actual and a real surplus free from all debts and incumbrances. The able men of that period, among them Jackson and Calhoun, could find no authority in the Constitution for dividing or distributing that money among the States. They finally had recourse to a loan or deposit, and in the Treasury to-day there is still held the note or obligation of each State for the return of the money received. Those States in law and equity are still bound should the Government choose to call for a repayment.

If the chief desire of those who press this bill is to square the books of the Treasury and close old accounts, why not credit the sum which each State paid under the direct-tax act to the amount of the loan each received under the act of 1836? This would relieve the book-keepers at the Treasury of much labor and would wipe out an old score. In order that it may be seen what States shared in the distribution of that fund in 1836, and the amount received by each, I append the following table, which I will not now take time to read:

Amount due from the several States, deposited with them under act of June 23, 1836.

L. W. REID, Acting Register.

If, however, gentlemen desire to refund a tax which was illegally and unconstitutionally levied and collected, and which the Government therefore is not entitled to keep, let us refund the cotton tax to the States which paid it. By an act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, and subsequent amendatory acts, a tax was imposed on raw cotton under which there was collected and paid into the Treasury $68,072,388.99. This tax was levied and collected on the cotton wherever found, but the greater part of the burden fell upon the producer. Between the years 1861 and 1868, when the law was repealed, there was collected from the Southern States $64,935,121.56 directly from the producers of cotton, from the planter and cropper, and that at a time when fortunes were ruined, plantations laid waste, and the labor demoralized. Was it not time to call a halt and remit the little, pitiful balance of two and one-half millions of the uncollected direct tax, when the Government had extracted from the cotton-growers of the Southern States more than three times the whole amount of this direct tax?

This cotton tax being a tax on an agricultural product, on a product which could be raised only in one section of the Union, and which therefore could not be borne equally by all the States, was an unconstitutional tax. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision in a case which came up from Memphis, Tenn., one judge being absent, was equally divided, four and four, on the question of its constitutionality, and that, too, directly after the war, when men's passions had not cooled and when even Supreme Court judges, who are but men after all, could not look at this question free from bias. The Constitution requires that all taxation shall be uniform throughout the United States. Cotton can only be raised in about eleven States, and as the law required that the tax should be levied and collected before the cotton could be shipped, that precluded the idea of uniformity. There was no similar product taxed in the Northern States, and it is well known that the spirit which actuated the passage of the cotton tax was the desire to place the burden of the war debt on a Southern product. If you wish to equalize some of the burdens of the war, here is your opportunity. Refund the cotton tax.

It was unconstitutionally laid and collected, therefore you have the right and it is your duty under the Constitution to refund it. The Government is bound to repay any tax which it may be ascertained has been illegally collected from the citizen. If the assertion and argument that the cotton tax is unconstitutional is doubted, open the courts and let a test case be made and forever set at rest the question. But if you insist on repaying the direct tax, about the constitutionality of which no man has ever raised a question, then we shall insist that you refund to our people the sixty-eight millions illegally and unconstitutionally collected on raw cotton.

The following table shows the amount of the cotton tax collected from the different States:

Alabama	$10,388,127.12	Mississippi	$8,742,995.93
Arkansas	2,555,638.43	Missouri	592,098.36
California	430.04	New Jersey	3,656.42
Connecticut	193.64	New York	867,942.68
Florida	918,944.98	North Carolina	1,959,704.87
Georgia	11,897,094.98	Ohio	447,127.12
Illinois	379,144.42	Pennsylvania	78,534.06
Indiana	92,727.22	Rhode Island	2,424.73
Iowa	.27	South Carolina	4,172,420.16
Kansas	486.15	Tennessee	7,873,460.71
Kentucky	553,327.45	Texas	5,570,401.25
Louisiana	10,098,501.00	Utah	1,375.34
Maryland	51,349.52	Virginia	825,856.87
Massachusetts	66,679.30

The State of Tennessee paid $7,873,460.71 as her part of the cotton tax. Give us this if you want to be just as well as generous. But until you are willing to do that do not hope to catch my vote for the more than doubtful proposition to refund to my State the $392,004.48 which was collected from her people under the direct tax. We in Tennessee are not ready yet to desert the Constitution and join a raid on the Treasury for that paltry sum. We are not yet prepared to tax the young, active laboring men of to-day to repay a tax collected from a generation that is past and gone. We are not ready to rob the women and children of to-day to lock up in endless litigation or in a deathless trust fifteen and one-half millions of the people's money. Most of those who paid this direct tax have joined the silent majority beyond the great river; their heirs or legal representatives are scattered to the four winds; many have no doubt lost all receipts and all recollection of ever having made these payments. Why then deplete the national Treasury and burden the governor of my State with an onerous trust such as this bill carries and put our State to endless litigation auditing the accounts of those who may still live to claim a part of this fund?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WALKER], which will be read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That for eight fiscal years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated from the money in the Treasury the following sums, to wit: The first year the sum of $7,000,000, the second year the sum of $10,000,000, the third year the sum of $15,000,000, the fourth year the sum of $13,000,000, the fifth year the sum of $11,000,000, the sixth year the sum of $9,000,000, the seventh year the sum of $7,000,000, the eighth year the sum of $5,000,000, which said several sums shall be expended by the several States and Territories under the laws of said States and Territories, providing for public education, to secure the benefits of a common-school education to all the children of school age living in the United States.

That such money shall annually be divided among and paid out in the several States and Territories, and in the District of Columbia, in that proportion which the whole number of persons in each who, being of the age of ten years and over, can not write, bears to the whole number of such persons in the United States; such computation shall be made according to the census of 1880, until the illiteracy returns of the census of 1890 shall be received, and then upon the basis of that census. And in each State and Territory, and in the District of Columbia, in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money received in such State or Territory, and in the District of Columbia, shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools, respectively, in the same manner and proportion as is now provided by the laws of each of said States for the education of the children thereof, and in the District of Columbia and the Territories, according to law.

Mr. CRAIN. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is germane to the bill now pending. As I understand it, the object of the bill is to refund to the different States money which has been collected from them under a direct tax, and I insist, sir, that if this Congress has a right to refund that tax, it has a right also to pay to the different States any amount of money it may choose for the purposes of education.

Mr. CRAIN. And to dictate how that money shall be expended?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAIN. You might as well not return it at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I am not talking for the State of Texas now, but for the country at large.

Mr. CRAIN. I am talking for the country at large, too. The State of Texas does not need the money, because her people are not illiterate.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I insist that the Government of the United States has the right to make this appropriation, notwithstanding the opinion of the gentleman from Texas, because we have now in the Treasury, as I understand from the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury, over a hundred million dollars of surplus money which has been unjustly and unnecessarily collected from the people, and, as was remarked here this morning, that money is held by the General Government as a trustee for the various States, and I insist that it shall be refunded to the States for the purposes set forth in this amendment, and I insist that under the rules of the House the proposition is germane to the proposition which is now pending.

Mr. COLLINS. Is it not germane in another sense—as part of a general raid on the Treasury of the United States to rid it of the surplus?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Well, sir, I am not taking that position just now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, as the amendment embraces a subject different from that under consideration. Under general parliamentary law—the common law of parliamentary bodies—this amendment would be in order——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I understand we are operating under general parliamentary law.

The CHAIRMAN. But under the rules of this House the amendment is not in order, especially under clause 7, Rule XVI, which provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment." This is a proposition on a subject different from that under consideration, and is therefore not in order as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Is not the subject under consideration the appropriation of money? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The subject-matter of the pending bill is the return of certain taxes to States that have heretofore paid them. The proposition submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina contemplates making large appropriations from the public Treasury for the support of common schools in the manner provided in the amendment, which is a subject entirely different from that under consideration. The point of order is therefore sustained; the amendment is out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I dislike very much to dissent from the ruling of the Chair, but on account of the importance of this matter I desire to take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? [The vote was taken.] In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to take the question by a rising vote, but before the count was completed Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, withdrew the call for a division.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I will now offer an amendment which I think is in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

"And it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia, out of the surplus in said Treasury, a sum equal to the proportionate amount of said surplus collected under the internal-revenue laws from said State or Territory and the District of Columbia, each of which said several sums shall be expended by the several States and Territories for educational purposes in the same manner and proportion as is now provided by the law of each of said States for the education of the children thereof."

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I offer that amendment, which I think is germane.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane; for it has the same effect really as an appropriation of money in the Treasury, collected in a particular way, for certain school purposes. In the second place it goes to the extent of directing what shall be done with this money by the States—how they shall use it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes a point of order against this amendment. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina on the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I hope the Chair will sustain me this time. My amendment goes to the extent of refunding from the Treasury of the United States money now there, unjustly and unequally collected, just as much so, as has been contended on this floor, as this direct tax. My amendment does not propose to make any appropriation, but to refund money now lying in the Treasury, collected under a specific law, just as this bill proposes to refund a certain tax lying in the Treasury, collected under the direct-tax law.

Mr. DOCKERY. Would it not be better to relieve this condition by cutting down taxes?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. This amendment proposes to refund another tax in addition to the one which the bill proposes to refund.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is subject to the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio. While it purports to make an appropriation out of a particular kind of revenues in the Treasury, it is well known to the Chair and to the Committee of the Whole that such revenues are merely a part of the revenues in the Treasury; and this is really an appropriation of revenues now in the Treasury for common-school purposes, which is a subject different from that under consideration. Therefore the amendment is not in order, under clause 7 of Rule XVI, to which the Chair has already referred. For this reason the point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I understand the Chair does not rule this amendment out on the ground that it makes an appropriation, but because the object of that appropriation is proposed to be controlled by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules out the amendment on the ground that this is a bill simply to refund taxes heretofore collected from the States, while the amendment is a proposition for the purpose of supporting common schools in the States—an entirely different subject.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Then I modify my amendment by striking out that portion of it which directs how the money shall be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And it shall be the further duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia, out of the surplus in said Treasury, a sum equal to the proportionate amount of said surplus collected under the internal-revenue laws from said State or Territory and the District of Columbia.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make the point of order that this proposition is not germane to the subject under consideration. The bill we are considering proposes to refund certain taxes collected from the States. This amendment, under the guise of a refund, proposes to appropriate to the States a certain amount of money which happens to have been collected in a certain manner—not money collected from the States or by the States, but money collected by the United States from the people.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in some doubt whether this amendment is obnoxious to clause 7, Rule XVI.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I think I am entitled to the benefit of the doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition in the present form is one to distribute the surplus in the Treasury amongst the several States according to the amount paid by the citizens of the several States under the internal-revenue system. The Chair is of the opinion it is not obnoxious to the rule and should be submitted to the committee for consideration, and not suppressed as out of order.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, asked for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 96.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. CASWELL and Mr. JOHNSTON of North Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I will withdraw my point of no quorum if we can get a vote by yeas and nays on this in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. No arrangement of that kind can be made in the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. It might be by agreement. I want to get a record on this so the country may see who are responsible for keeping the surplus in the Treasury.

The tellers took their places.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, withdrew his point of no quorum.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and Mr. RICHARDSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message was received from the Senate by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announcing the passage of bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. D. Wilson; and

A bill (H. R. 11764) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

DIRECT TAX.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I now move as an amendment, to come in after the first section, what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such person as shall in each case apply therefor, and furnish satisfactory evidence that such applicant was at the time of the sales hereinafter mentioned the legal owner, or is the heir at law or devisee of the legal owner of such lands as were sold in the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke's, in the State of South Carolina, under the said acts of Congress, the value of said lands in the manner following, to wit: to the owners of the lots in the town of Beaufort, the value assessed thereon for taxation by the United States direct-tax commissioners for South Carolina; to the owners of lands which were rated for taxation by the State of South Carolina as being usually cultivated, or capable of cultivation, $10 per acre for each acre thereof returned on the proper tax-book; to the owners of all other lands, $1 per acre for each acre thereof returned on said tax-book: Provided, That in all cases where such owners, or persons claiming under them, have redeemed or purchased said lands, or any part thereof, from the United States, they shall not receive compensation for such part so redeemed or purchased, but they shall receive whatever amounts were paid by them to the United States for such redemption or purchase: And provided further, That in all cases where said owners have heretofore received from the United States the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of their lands, such sums shall be deducted from the sum which they are entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. —. That in all cases where persons, while serving in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps of the United States, purchased any of said lands under section 11 of the act of Congress approved June 7, 1862, and such lands afterwards reverted to the United States, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such persons as shall in each case apply therefor, or to their heirs at law, devisees, or grantees in good faith and for valuable consideration, whatever sum was so paid to the United States in such case.

SEC. —. That before paying any money to such persons the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the person or persons entitled to receive the same to execute a release of all claims and demands of every kind and description whatever against the United States arising out of the execution of said acts, and also a release of all right, title, and interest in and to the said lands.

SEC. —. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $850,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay for said lots and lands, which sum shall include all moneys in the Treasury derived in any manner from the enforcement of said acts in said parishes, and not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. —. That section 1063 of the Revised Statutes is hereby made applicable to claims arising under this act without limitation as to the amount involved in such claim.

Mr. MCADOO. I desire to move as an amendment to that amendment what I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read, to come in after the words "Marine Corps."

The Clerk read as follows:

Or who has been honorably discharged from said service.

Mr. MCADOO. A word of explanation seems to be necessary as to the necessity of that amendment to the amendment. The amendment only applies to those soldiers and sailors of the United States actually in the service at the time they bought this land. I wish to extend it to those having been honorably discharged. I represent several constituents who had been in the service of the United States and honorably discharged and on the ground at the time the sale took place, and I think they should have the benefit of this provision as well as those actually in the service.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I supposed my amendment covered all cases of persons belonging to the Army and Navy; and I have no objection to that modification, as it carries out the intention of the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to state that this is an amendment agreed to by the Judiciary Committee to be accepted as an addition to the bill, and arises out of the enforcement of the direct-tax law in a certain section of the State of South Carolina, to which I called attention yesterday. In brief terms, in 1863 110,000 acres of land and the entire town of Beaufort, containing five hundred lots, with improvements of great value, were sold by the tax commissioners to collect the sum of $11,000 of tax. The Government of the United States "selected" or purchased the entire town of Beaufort, except three lots, and about 60,000 acres of land, which they afterwards resold at a profit of $400,000, as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury will show on page 29 of the committee's report.

The object of the amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to undo an act of injustice to a class of people who alone throughout the United States had their property sacrificed under this act. Let me impress upon gentlemen, and I beg them to bear it in mind, that the Government made a profit of some $400,000 out of the resales and leases of this property, and that there is included in this about $48,000 which was paid by soldiers and sailors of the United States as the first payment upon purchases of property from the Government, which was afterward forfeited to the United States without allowing the purchasers an opportunity to have justice done them.

I hope, therefore, the amendment will be adopted. It has been approved by the Judiciary Committee; it is germane to the bill; is intended to undo one of the grossest acts of hardship that has ever arisen under the operation of law, and must meet the approval of all persons who desire that our legislation shall be equal, exact, and impartial.

Remember, gentlemen, that these people lost their homes, their beautiful homes, in which they and their ancestors had for more than a century led happy lives. We give refuge to the oppressed of all nations; we give free homesteads to our people; shall we refuse this act of tardy and meager justice to an entire community that has been despoiled by the harsh enforcement of our own laws? Can Congress refuse to adopt this measure, and thus proclaim its deliberate determination not to redress this wrong? But a small sum comparatively will be required to accomplish this purpose. It is not a question whether Congress can afford to pass this measure, but whether you can afford not to pass it. You are about to give millions to rich and powerful States who have suffered nothing. What reason can be given for refusing the appeal of these people who have suffered everything?

Again, I repeat, the Committee on the Judiciary have unanimously approved this amendment and authorized its chairman to have it incorporated into this bill, and I ask the chairman, if present, to make that statement in the hearing of the committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina if it be not a fact that when this property was sold it was sold for the amount of the direct tax levied?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes; it was sold to pay the tax.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Very well. Then the title was obtained in this way from the Government. Now, have these parties paid the direct tax?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The Government itself bought the entire town of Beaufort, and afterward resold it.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is very true, as the gentleman has stated, but I can not see what difference it makes whether the parties who owned the property paid the tax, or somebody else paid it, so it was collected.

Mr. ELLIOTT. But the Government made a profit of $400,000 on the transaction.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That is merely a circumstance connected with the sale. Suppose the Government had lost $400,000; that would also have been merely an incident of the sale.

Mr. ELLIOTT. But the Government purchased the property for about $17,000, about one-thirtieth of its assessed value, and could not lose any such sum; and I appeal to the committee, Mr. Chairman, where the Government has gone into the market and bought property and resold it, making this enormous profit, that Congress should appropriate some small additional sum to afford the relief so greatly needed and correct an act of gross injustice. All the members of this committee must appreciate the hardships of the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from South Carolina to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes, sir; I accept it as a part of my own.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ELLIOTT as modified, it was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the amounts collected therein, respectively, as a tax or duty on raw cotton under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1862, and the supplemental and amendatory acts thereto; which sums, when so credited and paid, shall be accepted and held by such States, to be disposed of as their respective Legislatures elected next after such payment may direct.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I do not wish to debate this amendment. The only difference is as to the manner of distribution of this fund in the event that it is to be returned. As the main question has been fully debated already, I do not wish to say anything further than that I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all the amendment after the word "States" and insert "to be held and used by them as an educational fund and to be used in the support of free schools in said States."

Mr. McRAE. I desire to offer a substitute for the two amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the amounts collected therein respectively as a tax or duty on raw cotton, under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1862, and the supplemental and amendatory acts thereto, which sums, when so credited and paid, shall be accepted and held by the States in trust, first, for such of the producers who paid said tax or duty, or their legal representatives, as may make claim to and prove their identity, and the amount of taxes paid, in two years after the passage of this act; and, second, the remainder, if any, to be held and used only as a permanent free-school fund.

SEC. —. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That any State accepting the trust hereby created is prohibited from paying any part of the funds received to any person, syndicate, or corporation except the producers who paid the taxes on cotton grown by them, or their legal representatives; and in no case shall the payment be made to an assignee of such claim.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I shall take up very little time in discussing these amendments. I will only call attention to the main points of difference between them, and then proceed generally. The amendment I propose is the bill I introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress and now pending before the Judiciary Committee, and seeks to refund as far as possible the cotton tax to the producers. If they can not be found within the time fixed in the amendment I favor giving the fund to the States in trust for a common-school fund. That is what is meant, and I think it just. I know that many of the producers have preserved their receipts, and if the money was improperly taken from them they ought to have it back. It is theirs, and we have no more right to use it for some other purpose than Congress had to take it in the first place. Let us not use other people's money to create a school fund.

If my amendment is not adopted I am willing to accept that offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], and if that is rejected then I would take as the next best that proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN]. I do not propose to enter into any controversy with my friends about the distribution of the fund at this time, for it is very apparent to my mind that the other side of the House does not intend that it shall be refunded at all for any purpose.

Many of our friends who have opposed refunding this tax appear to understand nothing at all about the manner in which the tax was collected nor the effect it had on the price of cotton. Some very absurd statements have been made. I am glad, however, that all the people of the North do not think that the tax was not on the producer but a tax on consumption. I am surprised that any Representative would so assert.

None who are willing to be fair and who will take the time to learn how the market is regulated will take any such absurd position. Perhaps our friends on the other side who have advanced such ideas would give some attention to the opinions of the New York Chamber of Commerce, since they will not listen to those interested. I will therefore ask the Clerk to read the following memorial:

The Clerk read as follows:

MEMORIAL OF THE NEW YORK CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AS TO THE PROPOSED TAX OF 5 CENTS PER POUND ON COTTON.

[May 15, 1866.—Referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.]

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

May it please your honorable bodies, the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York respectfully represents that the following report of the select committee appointed by the Chamber of Commerce to consider "the effect of the proposed tax by Congress of 5 cents per pound upon cotton" was this day unanimously adopted as the sense of the chamber and ordered to be transmitted to Congress for their consideration, namely:

They report that the subject is one of vast interest to that section of the country in which cotton is grown, of great national concern, and especially worthy of consideration in view of the political state of the South.

They assume that in an enlightened community of merchants the importance of dealing justly with the South at the present juncture will be deeply felt; and adopt as the sentiment of this community that if any error is committed in our national legislation it should not be on the side of severity. If it is necessary to exclude representatives of the Southern States from the Halls of Congress because of disabilities growing out of the recent war, and measures are to be adopted affecting the industries of a large section and of a numerous people, these measures should be characterized by a spirit of generosity which will take the sting from the declaration that "taxation without representation is tyranny." It should appear in after years, when prosperity in the South takes the place of present adversity, and fraternal relations are again restored in and out of Congress, that in the days of her weakness the North and West did not take undue advantage of the South, discriminating against her industry and imposing burdens too heavy to be borne, but on the contrary that a spirit of magnanimity ruled in the councils of the nation, disposing our legislators to deal generously with the people of the South, thus to aid in restoring them from a state of weakness to a condition of strength.

These are the views that animate the committee; and they are such as in their opinion this chamber should urge upon Congress as of most importance in considering the amount of internal-revenue tax to be levied upon raw cotton.

They are deeply impressed with the feeling, as they suppose all right-minded men are, that the cultivation of cotton should be encouraged by all proper means, and should not be discouraged by onerous taxation. And the committee beg to present some of the reasons which in their judgment are conclusive against a duty of 5 cents per pound on the great Southern product, namely:

1. That the cotton interests in India, Brazil, and Egypt have accumulated large capitals from the high prices of the last three years, while our planters, as a rule, have lost all theirs.

2. That nothing has yet occurred to arrest the extension of cotton production in these countries, and nothing will arrest it short of material and permanent decline in prices hereafter.

3. That in the last five years railroads have been opening to traffic in India, and other means of transportation have been improved; and as the Indian Government guaranties an annual dividend of not less than 5 per cent. to railway stockholders, we must suppose branch railroads will be made wherever they are likely to pay.

4. That during the four years' famine of United States cotton in Europe great improvements have been made in the manufacture of yarns and fabrics from India cotton, so that eminent manufacturers who thought formerly that they could only use American in making their standard fabrics have found that a mixture of four-fifths India and one-fifth American, or even nine-tenths India and one-tenth American, produced the requisite quality; at least, so it is stated on authority which the committee are forced to respect, without being competent to indorse it.

5. That the expenses in the United States of producing, transporting, and selling at the ports, exclusive of tax, must be estimated this year at not less than 13 cents per pound, in case of a yield of two and one-half millions of bales, and about 2 cents more if the yield is two millions, and still more if the yield is less.

It is sometimes said, but very inconsiderately, that the cultivation of cotton in India and Egypt has been a failure. Let us examine this up to the present time, and give the latest possible light upon the question.

The average import into Liverpool from the 1st January to 20th April has been as follows (in bales):

Period.	India.	Egypt.	Brazil.
For three years, 1859 to 1861	116,000	40,000	30,000
For three years, 1862 to 1864	198,000	90,000	54,000
For two years, 1865 and 1866	293,000	144,000	151,000

Quantity known (on April 20, at Liverpool) to be at sea for England from India (in bales):

Date.	1866.	1865.	1864.	1863.	1862.
On April 20 in each year	545,000	305,000	248,000	188,000	184,000
Stock of all kinds of cotton in Liverpool on April 20	820,000	575,000	472,000	203,000	422,000

	India.	Egypt.	Brazil.
Average twelve months' import into Great Britain in ten years, from 1843 to 1852, inclusive (bales)	214,000	70,000	120,000
The like during 1865	1,267,000	334,000	340,000

The above tables show that the production of cotton has been an eminent success in India, Egypt, and Brazil, in quantity; and whatever may be said to the contrary, the quality even of India cotton is good enough to drag down the price of our own growth, as happened in Liverpool last month, to the extent of sixpence sterling per pound, equal to 15 or 16 cents of our money, in less than six weeks.

The natural course seems now to be for cotton to decline, perhaps very slowly, and by fits and starts, until it reaches half its present value, if the growths of 1866 and 1867 are prolific; and it is equally natural to suppose our planters must make two successive crops each of three or four millions of bales, and sell them at very low prices, before the cultivation in the Bombay district will be materially curtailed.

The prospective difficulties of the American planter, even without any tax on cotton, are great; probably greater than he supposes, as both in the North and South there are still lurking ideas that "American cotton is king." For if he secures a large crop he is sure to meet a low price, while if his crop is short, and his earnings therefore small, the cultivation in other countries will continue to increase.

Yet, at this very time, when he is struggling for existence, a tax of 5 cents per pound is proposed, which being practically an export duty, is equivalent to charging him with that amount for the purpose of paying it over to the cultivators of India, Egypt, and Brazil. And still it is expected he is to compete successfully with those growers. Our knowledge of the proposition is mainly derived from the sketch of a bill for amending the internal-revenue act, published some days ago in our papers. We deem it reasonable to suppose that it was first suggested when cotton was worth 50 cents, and expected by some persons to be 60 or 70 cents per pound this summer, while the present average value at the ports of the United States is little more than 30 cents, and if it is to go to 40, it must be from speculation for resale chiefly to our spinners, and because of anticipated failure of the growth of this year.

The bill is based upon the assumption that thirty-four millions of revenue will be derived from this tax, and connects with the recommendation other proposed changes in the law, which are as favorable to the wealthier portions of our country as the tax referred to is oppressive to the South, namely:

1. The reduction of taxes on incomes.

2. A drawback on cotton goods, when exported, of 5 cents per pound, thus increasing the bounty on their production from 2 to 5 cents per pound.

3. The abolition of the tax of $1 per barrel on crude and one-fifth of that on refined petroleum.

There is in these and other modifications suggested in the existing law a want of impartiality which, in the judgment of the committee, is calculated to provoke hostility at the South, and to excite in all honest minds at the North the hope that such a purpose will not prevail. It is not as though the people of the South were prepared to enter into competition with the manufacturers of the North for the benefit to be conferred through the payment of the proposed bounty on cotton goods exported. They are not and can not be for years to come; and the imposition of a discriminating tax which tends to make the rich of the North richer and the poor of the South poorer operates as a discouragement to those who, with heavy hearts but honest endeavor, strive to regain their lost fortunes.

The committee feel that it would be wiser and better to lift up those who are now cast down, and by just and generous legislation to inspire the Southern people with hope of better days rather than by an opposite course to prolong the era of political and commercial distrust.

If it be true that when "one member suffers all the members suffer with it," the committee would urge a more moderate tax than that now proposed, not in the interest of the South alone, but for the common good of all the States of the Union.

NEW YORK, May 10, 1866.

Subsequently it was—

Resolved, As the opinion of this chamber, that the present tax of 2 cents per pound on cotton ought not to be increased.

Respectfully asking the attention of your honorable body to the foregoing, your memorialists will ever pray.

A. A. LOW, President.

Attest: GEO. WILSON, Acting Secretary.

Mr. MCRAE. I have had this read to show what was thought of the law at the time it was passed. This was the judgment of the greatest commercial body in the United States.

The Legislatures of the cotton-growing States have time and again asked for the refunding of this tax in various ways.

MEMORIAL OF THE LEGISLATURE OF ARKANSAS, ASKING CONGRESS TO PASS AN ACT REFUNDING THE COTTON TAX.

[January 12, 1876.—Referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Arkansas, represent that—

Whereas the Congress of the United States passed an act which taxed cotton in the years of 1865, 1866, and 1867 from 2½ to 3 cents per pound, and under the operations of said law took from an already impoverished people about $60,000,000, and that said policy tended greatly to impede the speedy renewal of the great industrial interests of the South, and that it was money taken from the pockets of the laboring classes, who were least able to bear it, and to many who had invested their all in cotton brought financial ruin; and

Whereas an unparalleled drought has swept through a large portion of the cotton-growing States, and brought desolation and want in many localities never before experienced in this and the adjoining States; and

Whereas a great financial panic is now existing, and many of the laboring classes of our State can not subsist without assistance; and

Whereas the refunding of said cotton tax would work no hardship to any one, but would enable many poor and desolate families to procure the necessaries of life until they are able to make a crop: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That we do most respectfully and earnestly memorialize the honorable the Congress of the United States to pass a law refunding the amount of taxes collected on cotton during the years 1865, 1866, and 1867.

Resolved further, That copies of this memorial be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, and to the presiding officer in each body thereof.

Approved November 30, 1875.

Here is another:

Whereas there is in the Treasury of the United States a large amount of money placed to the credit of the cotton States, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring the cotton tax imposed and collected unconstitutional, and as various efforts have been made in Congress to agree on a plan of distribution and failed: First, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use their efforts to cause said fund to be apportioned among the several States interested on the basis of the number of bales of cotton produced in each State the years for which the tax was collected.

Second. That the General Assembly enters its protest against the proposition to appropriate said fund to the improvement of the Mississippi River as being unjust to the producers who paid said cotton tax.

Third. That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved February 2, 1883.

And here is still a later one asking to make a permanent common-school fund of it. This was renewed by the Legislature of 1887.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That our Senators be instructed and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence in having the cotton tax, about $67,000,000, distributed to the several States from which it was collected, according to the number of bales of cotton produced in each State during the year the tax was collected.

Second. That said fund so apportioned shall be paid to the treasurers of the respective States from which it was collected, and the same placed to the credit of the common-school fund.

Third. That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress by the secretary of state.

Approved March 25, 1885.

The people of the South feel satisfied that this tax was unconstitutional. They believe that much of the opposition to refunding it is on account of a prejudice against the section to be benefited by it. And I confess that I share that opinion with them after witnessing the discussion on this bill. You of the other side appear to be anxious about all these old matters if they do not aid the South and will fill your treasuries. You are willing to take $17,000,000 direct-tax money, but unwilling to vote anything on account of the illegal and unjust cotton tax.

Mr. Chairman, I submitted some remarks upon a similar bill that I introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress several times referred to in this debate, and I now call attention to other extracts which I shall incorporate in my remarks to-day. I lay greatest stress upon the points that the tax was both a tax on exports and a direct tax. These points can not, in my opinion, be successfully answered.

THE TAX UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The only power granted to Congress authorizing the laying and collecting of taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is to be gathered from the following parts of the Constitution:

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC. 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

And this power is restricted by the following prohibitory clauses:

"ARTICLE I.

"SEC. 9. * * * No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."

Taking these provisions together I conclude that Congress has full power to lay and collect all such taxes as are enumerated when necessary for the legitimate purposes of the Government, but always subject to the following restrictions and limitations, namely: Direct taxes must be apportioned; duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform, and that neither Congress nor the States have power to tax exports from any State.

The legality of this tax has never been passed upon by the Supreme Court, and is an open question. One case was appealed to the Supreme Court from Tennessee, but the court was equally divided, and made no decision.

That we may test the legality of this tax, let us ask what kind of a tax it was.

Was it a direct tax? To correctly answer this inquiry we should understand what is meant by this term as used in the Constitution. It is generally understood to be "a tax assessed directly on possessions, incomes, or polls, distinguished from taxes on merchandise or customs and from excises." Justice Chase, in Hylton's case, 3 Dallas, 171, said:

"I am inclined to think that the direct taxes contemplated by the Constitution are only two, namely, a capitation or poll-tax simply, without regard to property, profession, or other circumstances, and a tax on land. I doubt whether a tax by a general assessment of personal property within the United States is included within the term 'direct tax.'"

The real question in this case was whether a tax upon pleasure carriages throughout the United States was constitutional, the same not having been apportioned, etc. The judges all agreed that it was not a direct tax. Justice Patterson in the same case used this language:

"It is not necessary to determine whether a tax on the produce of land in its original and crude state ought to be considered as a part of the land itself; it makes part of it; or else the provisions made against taxing exports would be easily eluded. Land, independent of its produce, is of no value."

This puts the case in its true light; although it may not be decisive of the case, it is strongly persuasive. Following this idea suggested by this learned judge so soon after the adoption of the Constitution and in view of the fact that for more than three-quarters of a century after the adoption of the Constitution no tax was ever laid on the produce of land, I think I might with propriety insist that a tax upon raw cotton, the lien for which commenced the moment the cotton came into being and continued until manufactured for export, is a direct tax. If this position is correct, then it is unnecessary to pursue the argument further, because there was no effort to apportion it according "to the census or enumeration;" but we will consider the other branch of the question, and not rest the issue upon the proposition that it is a direct tax, as we might well do.

NOT UNIFORM.

Passing from this view of the case let us treat it as a duty, as it is called in the acts. As such it should be uniform throughout the United States. The fact that the duty was on raw cotton, which could only be produced in a part of the States of the Union, precludes the idea of uniformity throughout the United States. Of the sixty-eight millions collected under the laws nearly all was collected from citizens of the Southern cotton States, and the citizens of the Northern States paid no tax corresponding to it. When it was stated in the debates upon the Constitution that under the taxing clause certain States having property peculiar to their climate and surroundings might be oppressed, Mr. Madison very promptly and emphatically repudiated the idea, and declared that the Constitution did not admit of it, and insisted that either in the rule of apportionment or of uniformity all States and their interests would be protected. If the cotton tax can be sustained then the rule of uniformity has utterly failed of its purpose and imposes no restrictions on Congress whatever.

TAX OR DUTY ON EXPORTS.

If the tax is found not to be a direct tax, and also found to be uniform throughout the United States, yet is it not a tax or duty on exports and unauthorized? I understand exports to mean commodities conveyed from one country or State to another in traffic, and that the thing is exported when carried out of the country or State. A commodity may clearly be exported from one State into another, and when the market for the article or thing, grown or manufactured, is outside of the country or State where produced or made, then it is an export.

A careful reading of the Constitution and the debates upon it by the delegates who framed and the State conventions that afterward adopted it will, I think, make it perfectly clear that it was intended that no tax was to be laid on articles exported from any State. I desire to emphasize the fact that it does not say from the United States nor any port thereof to a foreign country. When the clause was first proposed the prohibition was against any tax on exports "from the States." This was changed so that no tax or duty could be laid on exports "from any State."

There was a purpose in making this change, and I believe that purpose was to prevent the laying and collecting of just such taxes as the cotton tax. It was not accidentally but purposely amended, and for the evident intention of prohibiting the imposition of any tax on products of a State taken beyond its limits for sale or consumption. Let us remember that the framers of the Constitution, men of learning, who adopted these words with so much care, were delegates of sovereign and independent States, at that time confederated together only, and as such refused to adopt a national consolidated government.

Without reference to how the Union is now regarded in some quarters, it can not be denied that then it was understood by the convention that there was to be no new, but simply a "more perfect Union," an indissoluble Union of independent States, with an enlargement of the power of the General Government clearly defined, but without any attempt at the annihilation of the State governments. They still remained foreign to each other for many purposes. A bill of exchange drawn in one State on a person in another was then and is yet a foreign bill as much as if drawn in Europe. Administrations in one State were foreign as to all others, and the same rule applies to corporations created by the States. A judgment of a court in one State is treated as foreign as to as others. Even the statute laws of one State must be proven in other States as the laws of foreign nations are.

The cotton was produced almost exclusively for export, either to the Northern States or to foreign countries. The strongest proof of this is in the fact that during the years of the rebellion when none could be exported none was grown.

I have stated this much in behalf of what I conceive to be the proper construction to be given to this prohibition, but for my present purpose in this argument I am willing to concede that "exported" means sent out of the United States to foreign countries, for the tax in my opinion was equally unconstitutional, because it was laid on all cotton, whether sent to domestic or foreign markets. The tax or duty was laid on all cotton in the hands of any person whatever, and the payment was required before sending it to market under a severe penalty denounced by the law.

It is perfectly clear that Congress intended to lay the tax upon the cotton for export as well as that used here, because it declares that "no drawback shall in any case be allowed on raw or unmanufactured cotton of any tax paid thereon when exported." As the cotton was grown principally for export to foreign countries and the tax being on all alike, it was necessarily a tax or duty to that extent, at least on exports to foreign countries, and is in plain violation of the fundamental law, which is based upon the soundest reasons, very forcibly expressed by Mr. Ellsworth in the following:

"There are solid reasons against Congress taxing exports: First, it will discourage industry, as taxes on imports discourage luxury. Secondly, the produce of different States is such as to prevent uniformity in such taxes. There are indeed but a few articles that could be taxed at all, as tobacco, rice, and indigo, and a tax on these alone would be partial and unjust. Thirdly, the taxing of exports would engender incurable jealousies."

The tax being on all that was produced, and as it was impossible to know what bales were to be exported, the acts can not be upheld in part even if the United States should determine to confine it to such as was not sent to foreign countries. This principle is clearly announced in the case of Wynehauner vs. The People (13 N. Y., 441):

"The general rule on this subject is that where part of a law is in conflict with the Constitution, and that part is entirely separable from the residue, so that other portions of the law can be enforced without reference to it, then the unconstitutional part only will be condemned. But where the legislative provision is indivisible, and the necessary discrimination has, as in this case, to be made at the trial, so that the rights invaded can only be protected by repeated judgments against the validity of the law, although there may be a class of cases to which it might properly apply, the provision is wholly void. The law, therefore, must be revised and the proper discrimination made before it can be enforced."

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if this decision, which appears to be so well founded in principle and supported by abundant authority, is correct, it would be impossible to hold the tax constitutional, even if it could be shown whether the particular cotton taxed was or was not sent abroad. The provisions of the act were not divisible, and so the whole was void. It would be utterly impossible for any producer who paid this tax to tell whether the cotton upon which he paid was sent beyond the United States or not. The Supreme Court in Brown vs. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419) says:

"An impost, or duty on imports, is a custom or a tax levied on articles brought into a country, and is most usually secured before the importer is allowed to exercise his rights of ownership over them, because evasions of the law can be prevented more certainly by executing it while the articles are in its custody. It would not, however, be less an impost or duty on the articles if it were to be levied on them after they were landed. The policy and consequent practice of laying or securing the duty before or on entering the port does not limit the power to that state of things, nor, consequently, the prohibition, unless the true meaning of the clause so confines it. What, then, are 'imports?' The lexicons inform us they are 'things imported.' If we appeal to usage for the meaning of the word we shall receive the same answer. They are the articles themselves which are brought into the country. 'A duty on imports,' then, is not merely a duty on the act of importation, but it is a duty on the thing imported. It is not, taken in its literal sense, confined to a duty levied while the article is entering the country, but extends to a duty levied after it has entered the country."

If the prohibition prevents the States from taxing articles imported, even after entering the territory of the State, would not they be prohibited from taxing articles prepared for export, although not exported? In the one case it would be impracticable to collect until it comes in, and the other after it went out. If the States can not lay the tax on exports, then the United States can not, for the same prohibition exists in the one case as in the other. The cotton was necessarily an export, for there was no sufficient home market for it. It was grown for that purpose.

When does the going out or the exportation begin? Is it when it leaves some port of entry or when it leaves the cotton-press of the farmer? If the former, the prohibition against taxing exports extends alone to the Atlantic and Pacific States, such as have ports of entry, and exports may be taxed in all other States.

Will any one contend that the Government could tax a product grown principally for export while in the hands of the producer and prohibit the shipment to New Orleans until the tax is paid when it could not tax the same product there when ready for shipment? If the right existed at all it commenced when the property came into being and continued until it passed beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and as it could not continue as to products going out so it never existed at all as to articles grown for the export trade.

Mr. Story, in discussing this clause of the Constitution in his able commentaries on the Constitution, declares that it was the "obvious object of the convention to prevent any possibility of applying the power to lay taxes or regulate commerce injuriously to the interests of any one State so as to favor or aid another." He argued with great force that if Congress were to lay a duty on exports from any one State it might unreasonably injure or even destroy the staple productions or commerce articles of that State. Continuing with the argument, as if he had in his mind the cotton tax now in question, he said: "The inequalities of such a tax would be extreme. In some States the whole of their means result from agricultural exports."

Such, Mr. Chairman, was the condition of the cotton States. Again, in the same connection, he said "the burden of such a tax would, of course, be very unequally distributed. The power is therefore wholly taken away to intermeddle with the subject of exports." He concludes his able exposition of this clause with the statement that "the prohibition extends not only to exports but to the exporter. Congress can no more rightly tax the one than the other."

If I have succeeded in showing the act unconstitutional, then the United States has no more right to retain the money than if no law had ever existed. It of right belongs to the persons from whom it was collected, and I insist upon legal grounds that it should be returned. But whether constitutional or not, it was very unjust to the people who were made to pay it, and ought, as a matter of justice, be refunded. Let us examine for a few moments the inequality of the tax.

NOT A TAX ON CONSUMPTION.

I have heard it charged by persons who were opposed to the refunding of this tax that the producer paid no part of it; that it was like the tax on imports and the tax on whisky and tobacco; that the tax was added to the price and was paid in the end by the consumers. This is not true. The larger part of our cotton is purchased and consumed by countries outside of the United States, and the controlling market for it is Liverpool, the recognized central cotton market of the world.

This being the case, the price there controls the prices elsewhere, and is itself dependent upon many things, such as supply and demand, commercial troubles, and the manipulation of the market. If the crop should be cut short by any cause, or there should be wars so as to affect the centers of trade, these affect prices at Liverpool, and in this way they are regulated at the center, and by it all other markets are regulated. If there is a rise or fall in the price there, it is at once telegraphed to all parts of the world, and there is at once a corresponding rise or fall, as the case may be.

The prices here are governed entirely by the prices there, whether the cotton is held for manufacturing here or for export. The tax affected the price only as so much expense in getting the cotton to the controlling market, and it added nothing to the value in that market. It was the same as if expenses of transportation. The purchasers did not have to pay the tax; it was paid by the producer when he sold, and was forever lost to him. The act was careful to provide for drawbacks to manufacturers for all the tax on cotton manufactured for export. So the manufacturers got the tax on such as was manufactured for export. To this extent it was truly a tax upon the Southern farmer for the benefit of the Northern manufacturer, without any effort to disguise it, as there is in the tariff taxes.

Under these laws raw cotton was made to pay this heavy duty, which fell upon less than one-third of the people residing in only a part of the States, when corn, wheat, and hay, in fact all other productions of the soil of every description paid nothing. A duty upon corn could have been laid with more uniformity than upon cotton, because it was grown and consumed in every State in the Union, and was more profitable to the producer than cotton. Was this exact justice? By what rule of right and justice could Congress say that the black and white laborers of the South should be made to pay a tax on their chief product, amounting in most instances to more than the profit they made upon it, when other laborers were more profitably employed in raising corn, wheat, fruits, and other products in the Northern and Middle States, which were exempt? There is no parallel in history for such a tax.

All the principles of taxation were disregarded. The income of the cotton-grower was first taxed, and in estimating that the amount of sales of all productions of every kind, including cotton, was added; so that the Southern farmer was taxed twice on the value of all cotton produced by him, and this double tax was cumulative to the other taxes required to be paid. The amount paid had no proportion to the value of the cotton.

Cotton that cost 25 cents to produce paid as much as that which only cost 15 cents. The poorest quality of cheap cotton paid as much as the best sea-island. It was laid at a time when not a person who was to pay it was represented in Congress. The heaviest of it was laid and collected after the civil war, with all its desolation and waste, had ceased; and the great bulk of it was collected from a people who had surrendered with the promise that they should be allowed to remain in the Union on the same terms and entitled to the same rights as those of other sections; at a time when the Southern heart was sick and saddened; when grief and sorrow were in every household; when widowhood and orphanage were all over the land; at a time when the horses, mules, farming implements, fences, houses, towns, and cities were destroyed.

The people of these States have submitted uncomplainingly to the results of the war, which swept away a hundred-fold more property than is involved in this bill, and some may be surprised that they should persist in having this piece of injustice righted. The reason for it is natural and is but an illustration of the truth of the statement of Sir Walter Raleigh, made years ago, that "with more patience men endure the losses that befall them by mere casualty than the damages which they sustain by injustice." They give no thought to the losses which come as the result of the war and their defeat, but they and their children after them will complain of this wrong committed after the war in the name of the law; not so much for the loss to them as the injustice.

The laying and collection of this tax was a wrong amounting to an outrage, and I believe the time will come when the great wrong will be righted. No representative government like ours can afford to treat its citizens in such manner. The United States can afford to do right because it is right to do right, and I have such faith in the sense of honor in our people and our institutions as to believe that in the end they will do right.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Is it in order to offer a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may offer an amendment to this substitute.

Mr. STOCKDALE. That I propose to do. I ask that the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the amount collected therein respectively as a tax or duty on raw or unmanufactured cotton under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1862, and the supplemental and amendatory acts thereto; which said sums when so credited and paid to said States, provided the moneys shall be accepted and received by each of said States, to be placed in its treasury to the credit of the school fund of said State, to be used or appropriated by said State equally to education of all the educatable children of said State, under the laws thereof.

Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCRAE. It seems to me that this is the same amendment as that proposed by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi].

The CHAIRMAN. Nevertheless it is in order at this time, being offered as an amendment to the substitute. The Chair will not decide whether it is the same as another amendment offered; but that it is in order under the rules of the House there can be no doubt.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment to the substitute, and it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute submitted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MCRAE's substitute was again reported.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Does not the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] come before the substitute for the amendment? I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XIX.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The amendment to the amendment is first in order, it being the province of the committee first to perfect the amendment before voting upon a substitute therefor. The question, therefore, is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I just wish to detain the committee a minute or two on that motion. I explained in the remarks I made yesterday my reasons for objecting to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] and others here about the return of this money to the parties that paid it, because it is utterly impracticable to do so. That is, while in a few instances it might reach the pockets of the parties who paid it, this tax bore most oppressively on the poor white and black people of the South who made this cotton that bore the tax, and they never would get a dollar of it.

I have some very good friends and constituents who would be benefited by the adoption of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas; but I have thousands of other constituents who are just as meritorious and deserving who would not get a dollar. I am opposed to this thing that is constantly going on here of doing justice to one or two or three men while thousands have been wronged that can never have justice done them under the operation of the same law. That is my objection to that proposition. I say if we are going into the refunding business, the best place to put this money is to make a common-school fund of it for the people of that section that need money for that purpose. And I appeal again to gentlemen upon this floor who feel interested in and who are often deprecating the illiteracy in that portion of the country to come up now and give us back something that is justly due for the purpose of educating the children of that portion of the country. I just wish to say one word more, Mr. Chairman.

We have had some heated discussions here this morning. I am very sorry to see that now. If this thing goes on much longer we will have to have another reunion and commingling of the blue and gray.

Now, it is not right for gentlemen to allow themselves to get into a passion on either side of this House and say hard things to each other. I commend to gentlemen on the Republican side the conduct of my friend from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, a man who says that he is utterly without malice or bitterness towards anybody in the world [laughter], a man who would not say anything to hurt anybody's feelings. I listened to his remarks here yesterday, and he put some questions to me as I sat in front of him. He wanted to know if we were not glad that we were back here, and he reminded us that this money that we are now talking about helped to bring us back. Well, we are glad we are back, but we would be a great deal gladder if we did not have such exhibitions of temper as we have had on the other side of the House yesterday and to-day. But, Mr. Chairman, this is a good place to be, and I confess I am glad we are here. I gave you all yesterday some of my early experiences after the war, and when you look back at my surroundings at that time and then look where I am to-day—behold me as I stand here—could there be a better illustration of the possibilities that open themselves up before American youth? [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, as I stand upon this dizzy height to which I have climbed [renewed laughter] and look around me, I must confess to a feeling of astonishment as to how a great many of you gentlemen have got up here with me. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us wind this whole thing up over this cotton-tax bill, and let us put on this amendment directing that the money shall go to an educational fund for the people of the South; because I want to tell you gentlemen on the other side another thing: If you go on at this rate paying yourselves back for what you expended in patriotism during the war, the first thing you know the country will not owe you anything. [Great laughter.] I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I have offered to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will be adopted.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, we had better get a refund of the cotton tax before we get into any controversy as to how we shall distribute it. The amendment which I have offered provides that the States shall hold the money in trust, to be disposed of as the Legislatures elected first after such payment may direct. You see already the differences of opinion that exist here about how the fund should be distributed. If it is refunded, the proper thing would be to allow the people of the States, respectively, to say what disposition should be made of it, and that is what is provided for in the amendment that I have offered. I hope that we shall now have a vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], which will be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that substitute striking out all after the word "State," in the sixth line, and inserting what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit and pay to each State a sum equal to the amounts collected therein, respectively, as a tax or duty on raw cotton under the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1862, and the supplemental and amendatory acts thereto, which sums when so credited and paid shall be accepted and held by such States to be refunded and distributed to the parties who produced the cotton on which such tax was paid, or such person as was the owner of such cotton on October 1, 1862, through the agency of such legal tribunals as the Legislatures of the several States may establish or empower; and it shall be held sufficient proof to entitle the claimant to recover for him to show by competent and sufficient testimony that he raised or on October 1, 1862, owned the amount of cotton upon which such taxes were paid.

Claimants shall have three years within which to file their claims after the several Legislatures shall have established competent tribunals or clothed existing tribunals with power to take jurisdiction and to adjudicate their claims; and all claims not filed within three years shall be forever barred. Any portion of the money that may remain in the hands of any of the States after paying all legally established claims shall remain subject to such disposition of it as the next Legislature assembling thereafter may see proper to make.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], which will be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 64, noes 129.

Mr. OATES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the alternative proposition of which I gave notice, changed so as to provide for a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of the constitutionality of the laws under which the cotton tax was collected. My object in offering that amendment is simply this: A large majority, perhaps ninety-nine one-hundredths, of the people in the Southern States who paid this tax have an idea that it was a robbery; that it was taken from them under laws which were not in fact laws at all because enacted in violation of the Constitution. It is a matter of general notoriety that a case was made from Tennessee, the case of "Farrington," and brought before the Supreme Court.

It was very ably argued on both sides, and all the questions were raised that could be raised. The first question was whether the tax was a direct tax or an indirect one. If a direct tax, it was admitted on all hands to be unconstitutional. If an indirect one, as was contended for the Government, then the question was whether it was a tax or a duty upon exports from a State, in which latter case it would be in violation of the Constitution. The Supreme Court was equally divided, eight judges sitting, and hence there was no decision rendered, but simply an affirmance of the judgment of the court below in consequence of the equal division of the Supreme Court. Now, if the question is submitted to the Supreme Court, and they hold those laws to be constitutional, then that tax was properly levied and collected, and I would not vote and appropriate one dollar to be returned to any one who paid it.

I do not want any of this money returned if these laws were constitutional; and if the Supreme Court should so decide, the people of the Southern States who are, and for many years have been, clamorous for the return of that tax will be satisfied. If the Supreme Court should hold that the acts were unconstitutional, then, I presume, no man of ordinary sense of justice would say that the money ought not to be refunded.

This amendment simply presents the question in that form, so that within twelve months any one who paid this tax may bring a suit in the Court of Claims, and whichever way the court may decide may have an appeal from the judgment which the court may render to the Supreme Court of the United States; and on such appeal being taken within sixty days, the law for the time being shall be suspended, and no other suit shall be brought until the Supreme Court shall render its decision upon the constitutionality of these acts. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CASWELL. The amendment has not yet been read. I have expected every moment the gentleman from Alabama would give us the benefit of the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That any citizen of the United States who owned raw cotton grown or produced in any one or more of said States, and who was required by any officer or agent of the United States to pay, and did pay, on such cotton any money as a duty or tax under the act approved July 1, 1862, or the acts supplementary thereto approved July 13, 1866, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 13, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof," may at any time within one year after the approval of this act file his or her petition and bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States for the recovery of the money so paid and collected from him or her as a duty or tax on such cotton; and the said Court of Claims shall hear all legal evidence and render judgment in such case; and within sixty days thereafter either party, the petitioner or the United States, shall have the right of appeal from such judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision therein: Provided, That whenever any case is tried before said Court of Claims which fairly presents the question of the constitutionality of said acts laying a duty or tax on raw cotton as aforesaid and an appeal is taken from the decision and judgment of said court to the Supreme Court of the United States, no other suit shall be commenced or prosecuted under this act in said Court of Claims until the said Supreme Court decides such appeal and passes judgment upon the constitutionality of said laws, and in the event that said Supreme Court holds the said acts to be unconstitutional all persons who paid such tax aforesaid shall have two years thereafter to bring their suits in the said Court of Claims as aforesaid.

Mr. CASWELL. I feel compelled to make a point of order on the proposed amendment as not germane to the pending bill.

Mr. OATES. I hope the gentleman will not make any point of order, but will allow a vote to be had upon the amendment. It is certainly a fair proposition.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Let a vote be taken, if it can be had without further debate.

Mr. LONG. Oh, yes; take a vote.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. CASWELL). Insist on your point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] makes a point of order to the effect that this amendment is upon a subject different from that under consideration. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. OATES. I now offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury in making payment and settlement with any State shall take into account and set off against the amount made due by this act to such State any amount which may be due by such State to the United States under an act approved June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of public money."

Mr. OATES. I desire to say only a few words on this amendment.

Mr. CASWELL. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. OATES. I think it is germane. The bill proposes a distribution of money from the Treasury to several States of the Union. This amendment directs the Secretary of the Treasury in making payment, as to how the accounts shall be adjusted; it provides that deposits of money of the United States for which the States are responsible, shall be taken into consideration and set off against the amounts which may be due under this bill; in other words, if any State has received money belonging to the United States, there shall be to that extent a set-off against the amount to which the State may be entitled under the provisions of this bill. I think, therefore, the amendment is clearly germane.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SPRINGER). The proposition submitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] is to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury, in making payment and settlement with any State, shall take into account and set off against the amount due by this act to such State any amount which may be due by such State to the United States under an act approved June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of public money."

The first section of the bill to which this amendment is offered as a proviso makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to "credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections, by set-off or otherwise, made from said States and Territories," etc.

It appears to the Chair that the bill before the committee, especially in section 1, is for the purpose of adjusting indebtedness between the States and the General Government; and therefore a proposition to extend this adjustment to other indebtedness is upon the same subject as the pending bill. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is not well taken; and the amendment is in order. The question is upon agreeing to it.

Mr. OATES. I desire merely to say that, as gentlemen will see, this amendment applies whenever a distribution is to be made to a State under this bill and that State has money of the United States on deposit with it.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected, there being—ayes 76, noes 138.

The Clerk read the remaining sections of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That all moneys still due to the United States on the quota of direct tax apportioned by section 8 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, are hereby remitted and relinquished.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia for all money found due to them under the provisions of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay the same to the governors of the States and Territories, and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That where the sums, or any part thereof, credited to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia have been collected by the United States from the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or any other person, either directly or by the sale of property, such sums shall be held in trust by such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the benefit of those persons or inhabitants from whom they were collected, or their legal representatives: And provided further, That no part of the money collected from individuals and to be held in trust as aforesaid shall be retained by the United States as a set-off against any indebtedness alleged to exist against the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which such tax was collected: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory, or any other person, to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent. All claims under the trust hereby created shall be filed with the governor of such State or Territory and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, within six years next after the passage of this act, and all claims not so filed shall be forever barred, and the money attributable thereto shall belong to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, respectively, as the case may be.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to section 3 was read, as follows:

Strike out the following: "And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory, or any other person, to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent."

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to this amendment. The proviso which the amendment proposes to strike out was put on the bill in the Senate at the instance of one of the Senators from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]; and the purpose of the proviso was to prevent any of this money being paid to attorneys and agents who had been working and lobbying for years to secure the repayment of this direct tax.

Now, the Committee on the Judiciary has proposed an amendment, which has been read, striking out this proviso, and I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment so suggested. I am in favor of the retention of the proviso in the bill which is proposed to be stricken out, so that those whom the States may have employed to secure the refunding of this money may look to the States for their compensation after the act passes, and not to Congress. I hope, therefore, the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary will not prevail.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I concur fully in what has just been said by my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] as to the propriety of the retention of the clause or proviso in the bill which prevents the payment of this money to the claim agents, and shall oppose the amendment to strike it out. It is confessed on all sides that there is a very large proportion of the appropriation contained in this bill already contracted for or claimed by those who have sought to have it passed through Congress. Like the renowned Dilworthy's appropriation, if paid to the claimants, it will be presumed that it took all (or much) of it to get it through Congress. [Laughter.] I think it will not have an injurious effect upon general legislation hereafter to let those who have aided in securing the passage of this bill go to the States and obtain a settlement of their claims through the State authorities after the money is appropriated by Congress. Congress may thereby escape the suspicion of having yielded to the lobby. How much is to go to State agents, claim agents, lobbyists, and others out of the amount appropriated by the bill in payment for services, or alleged services rendered by them in securing this legislation, no man can know. It is charged, and charged openly, and can not be denied, that the amount is great. That is something we all know.

Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes allowed me for the discussion of this bill, I can not hope to show all nor the principal part of its enormities. But I will give some of the reasons why I oppose the passage of the bill. A sufficient reason for me to antagonize it is that I regard the bill as in direct violation of the Constitution. It is a proposition, after a tax has been collected, to repay it; in other words, to collect a tax one day or one year, and pay it back the next. It is safe to assume that one-half the people who paid this tax are dead; many others can never be found, and as a matter of fact you might just as well go to the delta of the Mississippi River and undertake to take up the waters flowing there and distribute each drop back to the rippling rivulet from which it came, as to undertake to distribute this tax exactly among the parties who paid it.

But let us look at another feature of the case and see where this legislation drifts us. There was collected under the revenue laws imposing taxes on manufactures and manufacturers the sum of $425,953,845; and there was collected under what was known as the "income-tax law" $346,967,388.

Who will undertake to say that the same power that has come and engineered this scheme through Congress for the few millions that it contains, can not and will not for the hundreds of millions I have just mentioned again come to the front and be still more potent in demanding that it shall also go back to the parties who paid it? Who is willing to enter upon the policy of collecting the revenues, employing officers for that purpose, simply to turn them back, keeping from the people a portion collected, or collecting from other sources money to pay for their collection and redistribution amongst those who paid them? It was never intended to be one of the actions of Government.

The Constitution provides for the revenues of the Government and the collection of taxes for its support, but for the paying of them back to the people from whom they were constitutionally taken no provision was made and none thought of, even, because it was not supposed that such a folly would ever be perpetrated or even suggested by the American people's Representatives. Where is the constitutional warrant for levying and collection of taxes merely to return them to those from whom they were collected? Are we to say in a few years more that the manufacturers and those who paid the four hundred and twenty-five millions shall come here and have relief, and that those who paid the income tax shall be repaid? How can we refuse them relief if we take this action of Congress as a precedent? The income tax could probably be as easily returned as any other to the persons who paid it, and who can say that if the seventeen or twenty millions involved here can get up such a momentum as to carry it through the Congress, that the three hundred and forty-six millions of income tax paid can not be still more potent to secure its return? Will not the lobby be here then, potent as ever? I warn gentlemen that it is very dangerous ground of legislation upon which we are entering.

I believe it should be resisted firmly in the very beginning, and that this precedent should not be made for the return of taxes constitutionally collected. As to the taxes that were unconstitutionally collected or collected by doubtful authority, when it comes to consider them, who that stands by this bill, where the levy was constitutional, who that advocates the refunding of this direct tax, can deny their return? The return of the cotton tax would certainly be more just than this. A majority of the Supreme Court has never been willing to hold that tax constitutional. But we are told that injustice characterized the collection of this tax, and that some sections of the country paid more than others. Mr. Chairman, injustice characterizes the collection of every tax. You can not collect from every individual the tax assessed against him. Some escape by evasion, some by accident, some by death, some in one way, and some in another; and yet because of the fact that there may have been inequality in the payment you can not afford to turn around and refund a tax provided for by the Constitution and which was constitutionally collected. Such a proceeding is unheard of in legislation. When we had a surplus before in the Treasury, before the war, and Congress did not know what to do with it, no man ever dreamed for a moment of turning it back to the States or individuals paying it, and the expedient was adopted of loaning it to the several States. This was chosen because there was no other constitutional mode of redistribution. I can not vote for this bill, believing as I do that it violates the Constitution.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to this bill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer the following amendment to this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the following:

"That the sum collected under what is known as the direct-tax law of 1861 be, and the same is hereby, set apart to be specially and specifically applied to the payment of the pensions of the honorably-discharged soldiers of the United States who volunteered prior to the first draft in the war 1861–'65, and who are entitled to pensions under the pension laws, the sum to be first applied to payment of pensions to those soldiers who volunteered under the first proclamation of Abraham Lincoln."

Mr. WHEELER. That is an amendment which I believe every man in this House should support. The gentleman who has just taken his seat has truthfully said that under the law as it now stands it will be impossible to return the money to those persons who paid it. They are dead; they are gone; they can not be found. But, Mr. Chairman, we can find the brave men who composed the 75,000 men who enlisted under the Stars and Stripes under the first proclamation of Abraham Lincoln in 1861, and I insist that this fund, arising as it did from the first tax collected for prosecuting the war, shall be set aside for and applied to that worthy object. I do not propose that this fund shall be applied to pay the pensions of only the disabled survivors of these first 75,000 volunteers, and the widows of those who fell in the conflict, but that, so far as these particular soldiers are concerned, it shall be applied to pay them pensions whether disabled or not. If this idea is not clearly expressed in the amendment I will change the phraseology so that it will, or I will cheerfully accept any amendment that will render my purpose unmistakable.

Mr. HOLMES. Does the gentleman remember that these were three months' men?

Mr. WHEELER. They were the brave men who first enlisted under the flag of our country, and whether they volunteered for three months or longer can make no difference. They enrolled themselves under the banner of their country; they were the first patriots to offer their lives in its service, to discharge what they felt to be their duty, and they should be the first men considered. Here is a fund which you say encumbers the Treasury, and I call upon every member of this House, and especially every member on the other side of the House, to vote for this amendment. I tell you, gentlemen, I have read your speeches in the last campaign. If you keep your promises you must empty the Treasury. I repeat, if you redeem the pledges you have made, in two years after your accession to power you can turn the Treasury wrong side out and shake it, and not one cent will drop. The money will all be gone, and nothing will be left to pay pensions even to those who are now on the rolls.

This is the first time a proposition has been brought forward to give these 75,000 men special recognition. And no one who is committed to the policy of giving pensions to the most meritorious soldiers can vote against it. If he does, then he must stand before the country admitting that he prefers to have this money go to people of wealth and power, who did not participate in the war, rather than give it to those who were first to breast the storm of battle.

Mr. HOLMES. Why is the gentleman from Alabama willing to give it to three-months' men instead of the men who enlisted for three years?

Mr. WHEELER. Because they were first to enlist under the proclamation of President Lincoln. The proclamation called for enlistments for only three months. Had the call been for three years or for ten years or even a longer period they would have been just as prompt to respond. Most of these early volunteers re-enlisted and proved the best soldiers in the Union Army, and it does not become you or any gentleman on that side of the House to cast reflections upon these 75,000 heroes who marched to battle at the first tap of the drum.

Mr. HOLMES. It is not a reflection, but only a comparison.

Mr. WHEELER. Nine-tenths of them re-enlisted and served throughout the war. Gentlemen must remember that when they took up arms there were no bounties, no comparative fortunes, such as were subsequently offered as an inducement to men to endure the hardships and brave the dangers of a soldier's life.

Mr. HOLMES. Is the gentleman from Alabama in favor of paying pensions to the Union soldiers?

Mr. WHEELER. I am in favor of paying suitable pensions to the Union soldiers in meritorious cases. I have always been in favor of the payment of proper pensions.

Mr. HOLMES. Proper pensions!

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, I am in favor of paying proper pensions. The time may come when we shall need soldiers again, and need them promptly. And I ask Congress, now and here, to establish a precedent by giving special recognition and reward to men who sprang to arms at the first call of their country.

[Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Alabama who has just offered this amendment, I wish to say that the States do not propose to pay pensions. The war was for the preservation of the Union; and the United States Government does now, and always will, assume responsibility for such payment. The soldiers of 1861–'65 do not ask that Michigan shall pay half a million dollars to one class of soldiers while New York pays five millions to the same class.

The soldiers of 1861 will not ask to be thus discriminated in favor of, as my friend from Alabama presumes. To be sure, those who enlisted first are entitled to the full meed of praise; and they, the vanguard of the new army, have become the heroic men that my friend pictures. But by contrast, what shall we say of the men who left the old army at the same time and went upon the other side? [Cries of "Good!" and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHEELER. I will inform the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman left before any proclamation, before any war, and before any possibility of war.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. But did not he join the Confederate army before being released from a Federal obligation?

Mr. WHEELER. No, sir; he did not. The gentleman was released before he joined the Confederates.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. My friend from Alabama misapprehends me. I thought he was stating a grand truth when he said that those men who joined the new army were entitled to a meed of immortal praise for it, and I simply put over against that truth the interrogatory as to what we should say of the men who left the old army at the same time. I meant no offense. When the Government of the United States assessed this money to the States, those that were loyal paid it, and there was full authority for ordering them to pay it. The people of South Carolina and the people of Alabama were just as much obligated to pay it, but failed to do anything of the kind; and now, not having paid their share, we are in favor of equalizing this matter by refunding to the States that did.

Is there not equity in this? Is this not just? Mr. Chairman, people sometimes wonder why it is that the North was solid at the last election. I will say to my good friend from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] and to my other good friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that one of the prime reasons why the North is solid is that she is afraid of such leaders as they are. Let the young South, let the new South, let the men who are not battle-scarred from their services to the rebellion, let them come up here to represent the South and we shall not have a solid North, but so long as you say to us every time we propose to have pensions for our soldiers that we must raise the money by an income tax or do something else that is unjust or unfair, just so long we shall distrust you and just so long we shall vote you down. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the formal amendment will be regarded as withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

The amendment was rejected—ayes 28, noes 152.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund, with 5 per cent. interest per annum from the date of sale, the amounts of money paid by the purchasers of lands sold for the collection of United States direct taxes under act of August 5, 1861, and its amendments, where the tax for which the said land was sold had been paid in part or in full prior to the said sale, and where for this or any other reason growing out of the sale the purchaser failed to get possession of the land so sold, and said claims shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the amount so refunded shall not exceed $50,000 in any one case.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee, which will be read.

The Clerk read the first amendment, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "collections," insert "by set-off or otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the following amendment, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union:

SEC. —. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such person as shall in each case apply therefor, and furnish satisfactory evidence that such applicant was at the time of the sales hereinafter mentioned the legal owner, or is the heir at law or devisee of the legal owner of such lands as were sold in the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke's, in the State of South Carolina, under the said acts of Congress, the value of said lands in the manner following, to wit: to the owners of the lots in the town of Beaufort, the value assessed thereon for taxation by the United States direct-tax commissioners for South Carolina; to the owners of lands which were rated for taxation by the State of South Carolina as being usually cultivated, or capable of cultivation, $10 per acre for each acre thereof returned on the proper tax-book; to the owners of all other lands, $1 per acre for each acre thereof returned on said tax-book: Provided, That in all cases where such owners, or persons claiming under them, have redeemed or purchased said lands, or any part thereof, from the United States, they shall not receive compensation for such part so redeemed or purchased, but they shall receive whatever amounts were paid by them to the United States for such redemption or purchase: And provided further, That in all cases where said owners have heretofore received from the United States the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of their lands, such sums shall be deducted from the sum which they are entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. —. That in all cases where persons, while serving in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps of the United States, or who had been honorably discharged from said service, purchased any of said lands under section 11 of the act of Congress approved June 7, 1862, and such lands afterwards reverted to the United States, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such persons as shall in each case apply therefor, or to their heirs at law, devisees, or grantees, in good faith and for valuable consideration, whatever sum was so paid to the United States in such case.

SEC. —. That before paying any money to such persons the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the person or persons entitled to receive the same to execute a release of all claims and demands of every kind and description whatever against the United States arising out of the execution of said acts, and also a release of all right, title, and interest in and to the said lands.

SEC. —. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $850,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay for said lots and lands, which sum shall include all moneys in the Treasury derived in any manner from the enforcement of said acts in said parishes, and not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. —. That section 1063 of the Revised Statutes is hereby made applicable to claims arising under this act without limitation as to the amount involved in such claim.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought to be amended so as to provide——

The SPEAKER. But it can not be amended. The order of the House is that the vote shall be taken upon the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 132, noes 5.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill as amended to be read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to recommit the bill with instructions.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The Clerk will read the latter portion of the order made by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

And at 4 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, the same shall be reported to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed upon in the committee, and the previous question shall then be considered as ordered upon all such amendments and upon ordering the said bill to be read a third time and upon the passage of the same, and the votes thereon shall then be taken in the House.

The SPEAKER. It will be observed that under the terms of this order, after the Committee of the Whole has risen and reported the bill, nothing is in order except to take the votes upon those questions on which the previous question has been ordered. The language is, "the votes thereon shall then be taken in the House;" and the Chair thinks the word "thereon" relates to all the questions on which the previous question has been ordered. The question is now upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Several MEMBERS. Yeas and nays.

Mr. OATES. On the passage of this bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I would like to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that under the order of the House that motion is not in order. The Clerk will call the roll on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 178, nays 96, not voting 50; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER, at the conclusion of the roll-call, directed that his name be called, and voted in the negative.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. OATES. I object.

The vote was read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the pairs.

The following-named members were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. WHITE, of Indiana.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. CONGER.

Mr. NEWTON with Mr. GOFF.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. MCCORMICK.

The following-named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. HALL with Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. FULLER.

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, with Mr. OWEN.

The following-named members were announced as paired on this bill:

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. RAYNER.

Mr. MOORE with Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, with Mr. YOST on this bill. If present, Mr. YOST would vote for the bill and Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois, would vote against it.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. REED on this bill; Mr. REED would vote for the bill; Mr. FORNEY against it.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. RICE, on this bill. If present, Mr. RICE would vote for the bill, and Mr. GRANGER against it.

Mr. BURNES, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk read my name among the pairs. I have given no authority for any pair.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. CASWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced the adoption of the following resolution, in which concurrence was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the existence and powers of the joint select committee in respect to the Washington Aqueduct tunnel and water supply of Washington, created by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, passed October 8, 1888, be continued during the present session of Congress to such time after January 1, 1889, as shall be necessary in the judgment of said committee for the complete execution of its duties.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota; agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, and Mr. STOCKBRIDGE.

LAND DISTRICTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. DORSEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11766) to establish two new land districts in the State of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCMILLIN (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. J. M. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 11768) for the relief of the estate of Richmond T. Rutledge—to the Committee on War Claims.

The following petitions against the passage of the international copyright bill were received, and severally referred to the Committee on Patents:

By Mr. E. P. ALLEN: Of S. C. Stacy, of Tecumseh, Mich.

By Mr. BUNNELL: Of citizens of Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania.

By Mr. FORD: Of Charles J. Lockwood, of Sturgis, Mich.

By Mr. SENEY: Of H. Z. L. Mathias, of Galion, Ohio.

By Mr. SEYMOUR: Of Maxwell & Hannaford, of Bessemer, Mich.

By Mr. WICKHAM: Of W. T. Alberson, of Ashland, Ohio.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 13, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. HERRICK JOHNSON, D. D., of Chicago, Ill.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CERTIFICATES OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting certified copies of the final ascertainment of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States appointed by the States of Ohio and Wisconsin; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying certificates, to lie on the table.

COURT OF CLAIMS REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed by that court under the act of January 20, 1885, in certain spoliation claims; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

Mr. CALL. I am requested by the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor to ask permission of the Senate for that committee to continue their session during the sitting of the Senate to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

AMENDMENT TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WALTHALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3451) granting a pension to Frank D. Worcester, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the following resolution, submitted by Mr. CULLOM December 10, 1888, reported it without amendment:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, directed to continue the investigation ordered to be made by the resolution of the Senate of August 3, 1888, and such committee is hereby given all the authority conferred by said resolution, and power to sit during any recess of the Senate prior to December, 1889, the necessary expenses of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table until the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] comes in. Are there further reports of committees? If there are none, the introduction of bills is in order. [A pause.] If there be no bills to be introduced, resolutions are in order.

CONDITION OF INHABITANTS OF ALASKA.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the Department in relation to the condition of the inhabitants of Alaska, and especially of the treatment of Indian women by white people now domiciled in that Territory.

THE SIOUX RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the minutes of the proceedings of the commission lately appointed to obtain the consent of the Indians on the Sioux reservation to the act providing for opening a portion of that reservation.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed. The first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that, in the temporary absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I move to take up the tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 9051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. COKE, in paragraph 137 of the amendment of the Committee on Finance, beginning in line 495, after the word "shall," to strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including the word "made," as follows:

Pay two-tenths of 1 cent per pound more duty than that imposed on hoop or band iron or steel from which they are made.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Be admitted upon the payment of 35 per cent. ad valorem.

So as to read:

And hoop or band iron or hoop or band steel flared or splayed shall be admitted upon the payment of 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. I confess, sir, my very great disappointment at the result of the vote yesterday on the motion to put cotton-ties on the free-list. I thought that the industry in whose behalf that was invoked was one eminently deserving of that favor on the part of the representatives of the people. I have listened to the representations made in this Senate by the advocates of the substitute for the House bill, and their iterated and reiterated statement——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the President pro tempore vacates the chair, as I see he is about to do, I would like to ask what is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. That can not come up in the morning hour except by unanimous consent. I never heard the proposition submitted.

Mr. DAWES. Senators should be in their seats when motions are made.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from North Carolina rose before I came in here, I admit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was taken up on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. And after the morning business had been concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And after the morning business had been concluded.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I have nothing more to say except that that is taking advantage of the absenteeism occasioned by the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. VANCE. I was proceeding to say, Mr. President, that I had listened to the iteration and reiteration on the part of the Senators on that side of the Chamber that this was a bill framed in the interest of American industry. The American Government and the revenue by which that Government is supported have received little attention at the hands of those who have prepared this bill, by their own confession. It is provided exclusively in the interest of American industries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The Chair hopes that there will be order in the Senate Chamber. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon, if the Chair means to rebuke me. I was asking a question of a Senator. I say that this Senate has not gone through the morning-hour business. I insist upon it that it has not done it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia that at the conclusion of the morning business the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill now pending before it, and the motion was decided by the President of the Senate to have been carried.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is only fifteen minutes after 12 o'clock now, sir, and I would like to know when the order of morning business was called?

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I decline to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know you decline to yield to anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor and declines to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. VANCE. Such interruptions would destroy the eloquence of any man living, much more of myself.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I suppose the motion of the Senator from Ohio was well meant.

Mr. VANCE. I will venture to repeat, sir, in the hope that I may be permitted to finish a sentence, that every assertion which has been given to us by the Senators in charge of this bill has been to the effect that it is arranged specially for the benefit of American industry, and it has been the boast of the members of the majority of the Finance Committee that they have not regarded revenue, they have not cared whether they increased or whether they reduced duties; they have looked simply to ascertain what would be the best for the various manufacturing interests of this country, and the bill is framed with that idea.

Now, sir, if agriculture is an industry at all, it will be admitted that even according to their professions it is deserving of their zeal and their diligence in the same proportion that any other industry receives; but if it be contended that it is not an industry, that it is not an American industry, why, then, their view of the provisions of this bill and the idea that dominated them in framing it is perfectly correct. If protection is due to one industry, it is certainly due to another. If protection goes all around and every industry is protected, then it is valueless; because if one man is taxed to aid every other man and every other man is taxed to aid him, they go back in the same hole out of which they went, and no man is benefited. When two men sit down to play cards, if one wins the other must lose. If both win, then no man wins, and they come out even.

The secret of protection is that it only pretends to go all around. There must be careful declarations from time to time that it is universal in its benevolence, and that every man who labors and every man who pursues an industry, as it is called, who produces something, shall equally partake of its benefits; but there must at the same time be a certain class for whom protection is delusive and who are to pay the winnings of the more successful party. I think it is plainly demonstrable in this case that protection is so arranged that all the gains, which are abnormal, made by high protective tariff duties in behalf of manufacturers are the losses of the agricultural community who are not protected. Hence it is that we see here that this bill is arranged without the slightest regard upon the face of the earth for the interests of the agricultural classes of this country.

Take the cotton-planters, who are most interested in the provision which is now under consideration, the proposition to maintain the present rate of duty, without increasing it, upon the ties which wrap their cotton to be sent to market. In this case they not only refuse to give any protection to the cotton-planter, but they propose to increase his burden from a duty of 35 per cent. on the ties, which is now the existing law, to 108 per cent. If you want to be fair, if you want to do justice, it is very true that you can not protect affirmatively by a tax imposed for the benefit of the cotton-planter. A duty levied upon foreign cotton under the idea that it would benefit the cotton-planter of the South would be simply building a dam across a stream to keep the water from running up hill. The only possible way in a case of this kind where you can not protect by affirmative legislation, by the imposition of taxes, is to protect or to encourage by the withholding of taxes.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I rise——

Mr. VANCE. I decline to yield.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I rise to a point of order.

Mr. VANCE. I do not care what the Senator rises to——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish——

Mr. VANCE. I have declined to be interrupted, and I hope the Senator will not be permitted to interrupt me any more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is out of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a point of order. That certainly does not interrupt any gentleman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. If the Senator from North Carolina will obey the rule which requires him to take his seat while I do it, I will make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am quite well acquainted with the rules governing parliamentary bodies, which say that when one Senator raises a point of order the other Senator shall take his seat.

Mr. VANCE. I await the action of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is waiting to hear the point of order made by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The mere fact that I raise the point of order is sufficient to suggest to the Chair that the other Senator shall take his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will state his point of order. Otherwise the Chair will recognize the Senator from North Carolina as entitled to proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And I beg the pardon of the Chair and of the Senator when I insist that I will make no point of order until he does take his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is out of order, and the Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Because the Senator from Arkansas does not know any better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is again out of order. It is a question for the Senate to determine as to its correction.

At this point the President pro tempore entered the Chamber and resumed the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. VANCE. I was proceeding to state, Mr. President, that in a case where one industry could not possibly be benefited by the imposition of a protective tariff it would be fair to provide such relief as might arise from withholding a tax that would benefit or encourage that industry in lieu of the imposition of a tax. In this case, sir, I have stated that it does not possibly benefit the cotton-planter of the South to impose a tariff duty upon foreign cotton. It would be null and inoperative, of no possible effect; but if he could be relieved from the imposition of a tax which is a weight upon the articles which he has to export, it would to that extent place him upon an equality with the protected manufacturers of the country and would admit him to that extent to the benefit of what is called protection. The cotton-planters of the South are compelled to sell their products in the free markets of the world.

They pay from 75 cents to $1.25 a day for labor to their hands and they have to sell their product in competition with cotton grown in various parts of the world by labor ranging at from 6 to 10 cents per day, and all that the representatives of that cotton-growing interest now ask is a remission of the duty upon the iron ties which envelop their cotton. Is this without precedent? Why, sir, years and years ago, long before I had any acquaintance with the politics of this country, there was a rebate given on salt used in curing fish taken in the deep-sea fisheries of the Northeast for the encouragement of the fishing interests of New England. In addition to that the product when so taken was protected by a tariff duty.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will state his point of order. The Senator from North Carolina will suspend for one moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And take his seat, as the rules require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will attend to the enforcement of the rules of order. The Senator from Virginia will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. When the Senator from North Carolina takes his seat, which is one of the rules of order of the Senate——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is not required to take his seat when the Senator from Virginia rises to a point of order. The Senator from Virginia will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Allow me to state that the rules do explicitly say that when a point of order is made on a Senator speaking, the Senator must take his seat; but still I will forego that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I say that the morning-hour business was not called this morning before this tariff bill was proceeded with, and that we were entitled to the morning hour in which to appear here. There is no power——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will now pause. The order of morning business was called by the Chair and its close was announced after the entire list had been gone through with. The bill under consideration was moved by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], as he had a right to move it. It was taken up. It is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] to amend the bill. The Senator from North Carolina was recognized and is entitled to the floor. The point of order is not well taken, and the Senator from Virginia will take his seat.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will ask the Senator, in order to right myself——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will take his seat.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Virginia does not take his seat, the Chair will call upon the executive officer of the body to enforce its rules.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, as I was proceeding to say—which expression I think will constitute the bulk of my speech—there is a precedent for this withholding of taxation in the aid of a struggling industry. The rebate given upon salt used in the deep-sea fisheries of our northeastern coast is a case in point. In 1883 a rebate was given upon salt used in all the tidewater fisheries in the curing of fish in the United States. It was also given on the salt which was used in the curing of beef for exportation and is now upon the statute-book, and the meat-packers of the West are availing themselves of that provision.

For many years the duty has been remitted on lumber which was sawed upon the St. Croix River, in New Brunswick, and floated down from the Province of New Brunswick and around by sea into the ports of the United States, being owned by American citizens, for the encouragement of the industry of lumber-making in the Province of New Brunswick. A rebate is now given of the duty upon spirits made in this country which are exported from this country. Not more than a week has elapsed since this Senate voted to give a rebate upon all spirits made in this country which were used in the arts, for the encouragement of those who made those compounds of which alcohol is the base. For many, many years the duty has been remitted on all materials of a certain class and character about the building of ships, and the duty is still remitted upon all material used in repairing American ships in American ports engaged in foreign trade.

The duty is remitted or a rebate is given upon all tobacco used for exportation to foreign countries. The duty many years ago was remitted on the hides which constitute the raw material of our leather industry, for the purpose of encouraging those who make shoes and leather products. The duty on raw silk was remitted, and it is now permitted to come in free, for the encouragement and in aid of those of our fellow-citizens who have engaged in the manufacture of silk. In fact, the greater part of the free-list, if you will examine it, will be found to consist of articles the duty upon which has been remitted in behalf of and for the benefit of manufacturers, and yet every one of those who have thus had the duties remitted upon the articles which it was necessary to have in their business is protected by heavy tariff duties likewise.

Now, the cotton-planter of this country grows from 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 bales of cotton per annum. His production is increasing, and it is now fair to assume that it amounts to about 7,000,000 bales. Five-sevenths of that cotton goes to foreign countries, and it constitutes over 40 per cent. of the total agricultural products of this country which are exported. In the year 1888 the exports of agricultural products purely amounted to $500,840,086, constituting 73.23 per cent. of all our exports, whilst manufacturers exported but 19 per cent. and a fraction. Of that $500,840,086, which constituted the agricultural portion of the exports of this country, cotton unmanufactured furnished $223,000,000 and cotton and its manufactures furnished $236,000,000, or 34 per cent. of the total exports and over 45 per cent. of the exports of the agricultural products.

And now, sir, was it unreasonable, in consideration of this great product, by far the largest item of exports from this great country, furnishing 34 per cent. of all its exports—was it unreasonable to ask this little favor, that the iron ties which envelop the bales of cotton and hold them together for shipment to foreign countries, should be exempted from any taxation whatsoever? Are the cotton-planters and is the cotton industry not quite as worthy as those who take fish in the deep sea? Is it not quite as worthy an industry as the packing of beef upon the Western plains? Is it not quite as worthy as the building or repairing of ships? Is it not equally deserving of the protective plea of Senators on the other side as the manufacture of leather into shoes or harness or saddles or other leather products? Is it not quite as worthy as the man who manufactures cosmetics, nostrums, hair-dyes, patent medicines, and things of that kind, who are "encouraged" by the use of free alcohol?

If the Senators on that side are willing to say that they prefer to give all the protection of the Government to that class of individuals who are also protected by a high duty on the articles which they make, and leave the cotton-planter to struggle alone in the free, open markets of the world against the cheap labor of the Indian ryot, against the cheap labor of the Egyptian fellah, and all the other cheap labor of the world where cotton is made—I say, if the Senators on that side consider that industry is not worthy of their protection, not worthy to participate in the benefits of this legislation that is said to be for the exclusive benefit of "American industries," then it is time the people of this country should know that fact. It is time that they should know that Republican Senators and Representatives declare that they will give the man his raw material who makes a patent medicine, that they will give him free raw material who makes a hair-dye, that they will give him his raw material who makes a pair of shoes, that they will give him the raw material who builds a sloop or a schooner, but that they will not give the raw material, nor any portion of raw material, nor any aid whatever by the remission of duties, to the sturdy farmer whose product constitutes 34 per cent. of all the products of this country exported which maintains its balance of trade and its exchanges with foreign nations. If that be the protection to American industry which is to characterize the Republican party in this country, it is time that the sons of toil everywhere should know it.

Compare, if you please, the profits of the farmer with the profits of the manufacturer and see if justice and common decency do not require that some little remission of burdens in the shape of legislative favors should not be extended toward this toiling and worthy class. According to the census of 1880 the value of the product of manufactures was $5,369,667,000 in round numbers; the value of the material used was $3,394,340,000; the amount of wages paid was $947,916,674, making a total of wages and material of $4,342,256,674, with a profit remaining, after deducting wages and material, of $1,027,412,000 on a capital of $2,790,000,000 invested; showing, according to the census report, that the profit obtained by the manufacturers of this country in the year 1880 was within a fraction of 40 per cent., being, as before stated, a profit of $1,027,000,000 on a capital invested of $2,790,000,000. On the other hand, the value of all the agricultural products upon an investment in agricultural material of $12,103,987,000 was only $2,213,402, without any estimate whatsoever for the material used by the farmers and for the wages paid by them.

So on the very lowest calculation that could possibly be made on the basis of the figures given us by the census of 1880 the profits of the manufacturers were four times greater that the profit—yes, eight times greater in proportion to capital invested and numbers engaged, than the profits obtained by the agriculturists of this country; and yet we are constantly told that the manufacturers "must have a chance;" and when a proposition is made to give the farmers, the men who produce 34 per cent. of all the agricultural products exported, the poor relief of the remission of the duty on cotton-ties which envelop their bales, it is not only refused but the proposition is made to increase that burden upon them from 35 per cent., which is the present law, to 108 per cent., as has been so often explained.

Where is there any protection, where is there any justice in it? Where is there any common Christian decency in it? If you are in favor of protecting all interests of this country, protect them by affirmative legislation where you can, and protect and encourage and aid the others as far as possible by a remission of the duties which bear upon them; but if you insist upon heaping this burden of 108 per cent. on cotton-ties upon the already overtaxed men who have to struggle alone in the free markets of the world in order to benefit an industry in this country that manufactures something, in Heaven's name let it be a live industry and not a dead one. There are no cotton-ties manufactured in this country, as has been asserted in this Senate and not denied. Then, in the name of common decency, why impose a duty upon the farmers, that is to be paid now, in præsenti, of 108 per cent., in the hope or expectation that peradventure, perchance, perhaps, please God, maybe, some man will some day or another start a cotton-tie manufactory here?

Why, Mr. President, if there was any proof wanting to show conclusively that not only are the agricultural classes of this country neglected but absolutely imposed upon, that they are absolutely expected to pay and to make good the abnormal profits of the manufacturers arising under these protective duties, a slight observation of this Senate substitute would furnish all that is necessary. Not only are the cotton-ties increased, as I have shown, but the trace-chains have been increased from forty-odd per cent. to 56.

It will not do for the Senator from Iowa to apologize as he did the other day, that these were dog-chains. That I believe is perfectly exploded and abandoned. That is the worst come-off that I have seen yet done in the name of protection. The Jews had an old habit, an old ceremonial once a year, of loading a goat with the sins of the people and permitting it to escape into the wilderness. This is an attempt to load a dog with the sins of protection and expiate the sins of protection in that way.

It will not answer. There are not dogs enough in this country to bear the sins of this kind of legislation. Increase the duty on the farmers' cotton-ties, increase the duty on his trace-chains, increase the duty on his iron, and everything that is useful and absolutely necessary in his business, and then proclaim to the American people that this bill is framed in the interest of "American industry," and that wherever you have found it necessary to increase the duties in order to enable a struggling industry to compete with foreign countries you have increased them; adding that you have not considered the idea of revenue and do not care whether it is increased or not. That has been the language of Senators on the other side, and that kind of a bill is expected to satisfy the public demand for the reduction of revenue!

All through this bill you will see reductions made in behalf of other industries, but none in behalf of the farmers. You will see, Mr. President, by looking over that part of the bill which we have not yet come to, that the duty on nails is reduced; the duty on railway fish-plates is reduced; the duty on spikes, nuts, and washers is reduced; the duty on iron and steel wires smaller than No. 10 wire gauge is reduced; the duty on galvanized iron is reduced; the duty on the smaller numbers than No. 10 of iron hoops is reduced, and various other items in the interests of various other classes of the people are reduced; but those things which are especially necessary for agriculture, so far as I am able to see, are not only not reduced, but in many instances are absolutely increased, showing that the framers of the bill understand very well the proposition which I make that where profits are abnormally increased by taxation there is an abnormal loss on the part of somebody else, and the agricultural class, with their investment of $12,000,000,000, spread all over the country, unorganized and helpless, may be made the victims, the prey of this abnormal and unnatural increase in the prices of goods in this country.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] yesterday announced that in his opinion the duty on structural iron would draw more sharply the distinction between the principles and practices of the two political parties of this country than any other portion of this schedule. I must think that it could be drawn more sharply right here when I see so plainly that the purpose of this bill is to increase the burden of one industry in the country and to increase the profits of another, and to relieve everything but the industry that can not be benefited by a direct imposition of taxes. I think there is here marked unmistakably the distinction between the parties of this country—the one is for the benefit of the classes and capitalists of this country, and the other is seeking to equalize prices and taxes, and give the farmers and all classes, especially the poor, a fair chance.

I regret exceedingly, sir, as I announced in the beginning of my few remarks, the decision which the Senate came to yesterday in refusing absolutely to remit these duties upon the farmers' cotton-ties. I now trust that the good sense and the sense of generosity and justice that still linger in the breasts of men in spite of the seductions of capital, in spite of the necessities of party, will, to say the least, sustain the motion of the Senator from Texas and not increase these burdens upon the farmer if we can not lower them.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the continuance of the existence and powers of the joint select committee in respect to the Washington Aqueduct tunnel and the water supply of Washington after January 1, 1889.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HATCH, Mr. WHITING of Michigan, and Mr. FUNSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 2254) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ella M. Grover;

A bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. B. Wilson; and

A bill (H. R. 11764) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House bill relative to General A. J. Smith.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, and asking a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. COCKRELL.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to offer at this time, as I have been detained, an order for the withdrawal of papers:

Ordered, That the papers on file in connection with bill for the relief of Thomas J. Spencer be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, the bill not having been reported adversely.

The order was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CULLOM. I also ask leave to present a petition. I present the petition of Avis J. Hockey, of Paris, Ill., late of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying for arrears of pension. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Isadora F. Lincoln, of Boston, Mass., widow of Benjamin C. Lincoln, late major of the Second United States Colored Troops, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVARTS presented the memorial of the New York Produce Exchange, praying for an appropriation for an exhibit of the corn product of the United States at the World's Exposition to be held in Paris; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill No. 9051 is under consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rise to a question of morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not want to do more than to call up the resolution which I offered to consider the extradition treaty between this Government and Great Britain in open session. I was this morning mistaken, and mistaken by a report of a committee, in which I was in error. The Chair intimated that he would call in the police if I did not sit down. I think the Republican party did itself credit on what was called the fisheries treaty, and I did not think that when it was suggested from the Republican side of the Senate that the extradition treaty should go over until the first Monday in December, the Republican party meant to break its word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must call the Senator from Virginia to order. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, I propose to occupy the attention of the Senate for only a few minutes; but while we are discussing the propriety or impropriety of adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, that the present rate of taxation upon cotton-ties shall be continued, it seems to me proper that we should recall something of the history of the present rate of taxation.

On the day before yesterday the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is a member of the subcommittee that framed this bill, used this language in replying to a question submitted by my colleague [Mr. BERRY]. The Senator from Rhode Island said:

The present duty of 35 per cent. upon cotton-ties is one of those anomalies and inequalities which it is the object of this bill to remedy. The decision of the Treasury Department which placed the duty on cotton-ties originally at 35 per cent. was undoubtedly an erroneous decision, that is, erroneous in the fact that it did not carry out the intention of Congress.

The intention was that cotton-ties should pay the same duty as other hoop-iron. The rate of 35 per cent. has been continued for the reason that there has been no power that could remedy it. This is the first opportunity that we have had to remedy that defect.

Mr. President, the first use of cotton-ties, I think, was nearly fifteen years ago. About 1877, or earlier than that, some importers in this country took the ground that they were not taxable as hoop-iron, but should be admitted as a separate article of iron not otherwise provided for, and that under the then existing law the rate of taxation should be 35 per cent. The Treasury Department distinctly decided against this view and held that cotton-ties were dutiable as hoop-iron.

Against this ruling of the Treasury Department the importers took steps to secure a judicial decision. They raised the question in the circuit court for the southern district of New York, and there was a decision of that court in 1878 holding that these ties were admissible at 35 per cent. The Treasury Department immediately after that issued a circular recognizing the binding force of the decision of the court and declaring that these articles should be admitted at the rate of 35 per cent.; but while the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I believe, was Secretary of the Treasury the Treasury Department saw fit to overrule this ruling, and said that the facts raised in that court were not such as to justify a change in the tax and that the rate upon hoop-iron should be restored upon cotton-ties. The question was tested in the courts, and it finally went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in 1883 that tribunal decided that cotton-ties or hoop-iron cut to length for cotton-ties were admissible under the duty of 35 per cent.

So far the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island was perhaps correct, but he omitted to state that in March, 1883, Congress passed a tariff law in which this article was provided for. That act was passed by a Republican Congress. It was passed within three months of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that this article was taxable at 35 per cent. The decision was fresh in the minds of the members who had charge of the question, and the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States was composed when that act was passed of exactly the same members as it is now except that Mr. Ferry, then a member of it, is not now in the Senate, and the junior Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] was not then a member of this body, and, of course, was not a member of that committee. The Republican members of that committee, with these two exceptions, were the same that they are now. I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] himself was a member, and the Senator now in charge of this bill [Mr. ALLISON] was a member; and this was the provision adopted by that committee at that time.

You remember, Mr. President, as every other member of the Senate remembers, and as everybody in this country remembers, that the provision now in the law was made by a conference committee composed of Republicans, that they were not vexed by the presence of a single Democrat, that they were in the majority in both Houses of Congress, and they made the tariff in their own committee-room, knowing full well that it would be passed by a partisan majority in both Houses and practically without discussion, as we understand this bill is to be passed to-day by the Senate. This is the provision contained in the existing law enacted in 1883:

Iron and steel cotton-ties, or hoops for baling purposes, not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

That is the positive enactment by a Republican majority in the Senate and House of Representatives fixing the rate of tax upon this article. So, Mr. President, the Treasury Department is not the scape-goat in this case nor the scape-dog either. The responsibility rests upon a Republican committee composed absolutely of Republicans in both branches, from the Senate and from the House, when they adopted this as the law. I only call attention to it that the responsibility may rest where it belongs, and that there shall be no shifting of responsibility for fixing this rate of taxation from the Congress of the United States to the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, of all the agricultural products in this country there is less of human labor in the production of wool, perhaps, than in any other, and there is more of human labor in the production of cotton; and yet we find that although wool has been protected by a high duty this bill now proposed to be passed by this body increases the tax upon wool, while the other product, containing much more largely the element of human labor, is not protected, and in the very nature of things can not be protected by any enactment here, and when those of us who represent constituencies engaged in the production of this article ask that we may be protected against the competition with other people, or rather that we may be allowed to put the production of our labor into the market with as few restrictions and incumbrances as possible, we are met with positive, and unqualified, and, it seems to me, unreasoning denials by the majority on the other side.

The Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] undertakes to twit me, to taunt me for raising a sectional question when I propose that these ties shall be put on the free-list. Mr. President, I ask in the name of common sense why it is that wool being protected by the laws of the country shall be not only allowed to remain at the duty fixed by the tariff laws hitherto, but shall be increased, while we can not have similar protection at the hands of this committee? If these favors are to be doled out alike to all sections of the Union, why are we excluded? If we are not selected for the purpose of being discriminated against, why is it that when you are providing greater protection for wool you are imposing greater burdens upon cotton? It seems to me that it can have but one meaning. But for the disclaimer of the acting chairman of the committee, the honorable Senator from Iowa, the other day, I should think that this state of things almost positively proved the suggestion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that there was no intention that this bill should be passed, but that the political purpose was that it should be so framed in this body and sent to the other with such provisions as would render it absolutely impossible for any man coming from the Southern section of the country to vote for it, so as if possible to array one section of the country more strongly and distinctly against another. The Senator from Iowa distinctly disclaimed any such purpose, and I take it he does not mean any such thing. Still the suggestion naturally arises when I make this comparison. There must be some reason for it, and it must be founded upon some sort of policy, or there must be some purpose in view by the committee. What that is of course I do not understand.

I was not surprised yesterday to hear the junior Senator fron New York [Mr. HISCOCK], with the fairness that I have known for a long time to characterize him in all his discussions, state frankly that the expense for cotton-ties and for cotton-bagging was an expense saddled upon the producers of cotton. I will read his language:

I have no doubt that both that and the bagging are included in the cost to him—and I am not going to make any argument against that position. I will concede that all the oppressed farmer loses in the purchase of the cotton-ties is an absolute tax upon him. The evidence before the committee was that when the cotton-ties were used and taken from the bales at the Liverpool market they could be sold there for two-thirds their original value. There was no dispute about that fact. Two-thirds of their cost is reimbursed to him, and about 6 cents or 7 cents at the outside is the full cost to the abused planter, to the colored people, the friends of the Senator from New Jersey, of the cotton-ties which are placed upon his bale of cotton of 500 pounds.

The statement made by the Senator from New York that the fact was not disputed by anybody that two-thirds of the cost of the cotton-ties was refunded in New York, might be easily explained by reminding him of the fact that in the report he makes with this bill he states that no single human being was heard by the committee who favored the Mills bill. When you have heard only men who are in favor of protection, when you have heard only friends of manufacturers, is it a strange thing that there was not one solitary word said against their suggestions? Who sells the cotton-ties in Europe after they are taken from the cotton bale? They are then the property of the owners of the cotton, and they pocket whatever they bring. I have no doubt that that is taken into account and considered to some extent in fixing the price of cotton, and does to some extent reimburse the farmers for the cost of the ties. But everybody here knows that this proportion is entirely too large. I am glad, however, to have the Senator from New York admit that, as we have claimed in this debate, the cost of cotton-ties and cotton-bagging is a loss to the planter.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] this morning called the attention of the Senate to the fact that a greater number, perhaps, of persons are engaged and an immensely larger amount of capital involved in farming over manufacturing. If that is true, it would seem that in point of numbers and in amount of capital we should be entitled to the same sort of consideration at the hands of Congress. These facts, I have no doubt, are well understood by this committee. They were not blind to the fact that there is more than four times as much capital engaged in farming as in manufacturing when they proposed to make this discrimination against the agriculture of the country. They were not blind to the fact that the cotton-planters get no sort of protection in any possible phase of the case, but that everything they consume, every article of clothing, everything that they use on their plantations is taxed, and, as the Senator explained awhile ago, on a number of articles this tax is to be increased by the pending measure. But we are assured that the purpose of the bill is a benevolent one.

My venerable friend from Massachusetts, whom I see in his seat now [Mr. DAWES], in the course of some remarks a few days ago distinctly stated time and again that the purpose of all this movement was to enable the cotton-planter to get his ties cheaper than he would otherwise get them. Did I understand the Senator correctly? [Mr. DAWES nodded assent.] The Senator assents to the proposition? The cotton producers in this country do not so believe——

Mr. DAWES. I do not speak for anybody else, but that is my purpose, and my sincere belief as to what the result will be.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes, sir; I understood that to be the Senator's position, and I wish to reply to it for a moment. Mr. President, there is nobody in this Senate who has a higher respect for the ability and for the broad philanthropy, charity, and humanity of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts than myself. I am satisfied that he means exactly what he says, but permit me to say that there is not a man in the United States who produces cotton who believes that there will be any such effect from this action on the part of Congress. We do not believe that we are going to get cotton-ties cheaper by reason of this increase of the tax. We think the result will be to increase the price of ties, and for that reason we do not want it done.

Sir, the Deity himself does not undertake to compel any human being to accept His blessings. There is a faculty that we call free will, by which obdurate and hardened sinners may reject the greatest blessings that come from the Almighty himself. Now, we ask the poor privilege of declining this charity at your hands. You do not suffer in any degree by our declination. You propose to give all this to us. We tell you we do not want it, we would rather not have it. We believe you intend us good by what you propose, but for the sake of humanity just leave us out of the line of your charity. Apply that to other people who believe as you believe. Is there anything unreasonable about that? It seems to me not.

If, however, the Senator from Massachusetts insists that we are so blind as to stand in our own light, that we do not understand what is for our own good, and that he and his associates must proceed to give us this great blessing by which cotton-ties are to be ultimately reduced in price, I will ask him if he would be willing to have a provision put in the law that, after twelve months' experiment with this increase of tax, if the Secretary of the Treasury shall become satisfied that cotton-ties can be bought cheaper abroad than they can in the United States, they shall be admitted free of duty? If the Senator would be willing to have even that provision inserted we might consent to what we believe is a robbery for twelve months in the absolute certainty that at the end of the time we should be able to buy them where we could buy them cheapest while we are compelled to sell our cotton in competition with all the rest of the world without any shadow or scintilla of protection.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator desire an answer to that suggestion now?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am perfectly willing to have one made now.

Mr. DAWES. Can not the Senator see that the foreign producer having got the command of our market now would hold out more than twelve months so as to have it at his command in all future time? I am perfectly willing to test this principle upon such a length of time as will put it beyond the power of the foreign monopolists to command our market. That is my faith in the idea of a twelve-months' advertisement to him, "All you have got to do is to hold this thing up for twelve months and then you will have the American market for all time to come." That is the objection to that suggestion. I have not the slightest objection to a fair test of this American market, magnificent as it is, to see if we can not put it beyond the power of the English people and their ability to sacrifice enough to control it. They are in an intense warfare for our market; they will sacrifice everything to secure it in detail and in gross, and our conflict with them is, if my friend will pardon me for the illustration, just like the conflict of the civil war; it is a question of endurance. If they are able to hold out longer than we can, they will have our market in all future time.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. How long a time would the Senator consider a fair test?

Mr. DAWES. I am not familiar enough with the ability of these foreign producers who have now got control of it, or I could give an estimate. I am talking of the principle of the thing.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is characteristic of human nature to have a sort of dread of any danger that we do not understand. It has a vague and shadowy and terrible effect on us when we do not see it. I for one would be more willing to risk the dangers of a combination of producers of cotton-ties abroad than those of the producers of cotton-ties in the United States. We have had more experience with that sort of combination in this country recently than we have had with the other, and I would—

> Rather bear those ills we have,
> Than fly to others that we know not of.

I believe it is easier and safer; and when the people of this country are saddled as they are with burdens, I respectfully submit that they are not in a condition to be making experiments with other people. Let those who are more willing to try them do so, but let us alone.

Mr. President, in the testimony taken by this committee—taken, as the committee themselves state, from the mouths of men who were in sympathy with them in their political ideas—not one single witness being examined who favored the Mills bill or who was in sympathy with us in our views, this language appears. After stating the amount of land in cultivation in cotton in the Southern States and the probable production, the witness from whom I quote said:

> To prepare the land, plant, cultivate, and gather this crop requires the services of 1,300,000 laborers, who, with those that depend upon them for support, make a total of 4,000,000 people, say, directly engaged in the cultivation of cotton—1,000,000 more than our total population at the time of the Revolution. The value of the crop we can place at $300,000,000, or $75 per capita for those directly and indirectly engaged in its cultivation. Or, looked at from another standpoint, the total population of the Southern States, in round numbers, is 13,000,000, and that would give per capita $23. This, we must admit, is a small return to those engaged in this industry, and the question arises, how shall this sum be increased, how shall this great staple be utilized to the greatest advantage to Americans?

This was the problem submitted by a protectionist to the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, and the reply they give to us is that they will keep up taxation, and that upon an article on which we have been compelled to pay a tax that a Republican Congress, both in the Senate and in the House, said was sufficient and adequate only five years ago, the tax shall be increased 200 per cent.

Mr. President, this does not seem to be the right way to try a serious question. To those of us who are trying to understand this question fairly and honestly and who are trying to present the views of our constituents in a way to have them disposed of in justness and fairness to them, it does seem that there is no disposition on the part of the majority to solve this question in a way reasonable or fair to those who are laboring in the cotton-fields of the South.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the production of cotton in the State of Missouri becomes insignificant when compared with the other productions of that State. There are but four or five counties in Missouri where this staple is raised, and I therefore can not be accused of any sinister or selfish object in expressing my opinions in regard to this item of taxation upon cotton-ties.

I shall make no appeal, Mr. President, to any esthetic or sentimental motive on the part of the Senate or any portion of its members, but I can not resist the temptation of saying that, of all the items in this bill, that now under consideration ought to appeal to the magnanimity and generosity of the Northern section of this Union, that section which now politically and financially controls this country. The Southern people, after coming out of a terrible war, unparalleled in its losses of property, with their fields devastated, their homesteads ruined, their autonomy as States almost destroyed, with nothing but hope left, have made a struggle which illustrates in the highest degree the manhood of the American people.

The only staple (and I use the phrase, of course, in a limited sense, but with full significance) upon which they can depend absolutely and with perfect reliance is the production of cotton. It constitutes by far the largest of our foreign exports. It is the life and soul of all the commercial relations and of all the wealth in the Southern States. Now, to increase this tax upon cotton-ties, which enter into the value of the cotton of the South, their only staple, seems to make this bill, with due respect to its framers, oppressive and sectional in the highest degree. These people in the South to-day are confronting a proposition beyond the management of the wisest statesman. No man can prophesy the end of the race problem in the Southern States. The horrors anticipated from a collision between the races there are easily depicted. It is easy to point out the trouble, but I have never yet heard the shadow of a plausible solution of that terrible problem. It is easy enough for those of us whose States are not in that fearful conflict and confronted with that question to stand on a pedestal and philosophize in regard to it, but to the men engaged in its solution and face to face with the most awful problem ever presented to any civilized country the significance of which is beyond all language and its end beyond all prophecy, to these people this bill comes with an increase of burdens.

Mr. President, it has been alluded to in this debate (and I want to emphasize it) that cotton-ties are an absolute loss to the Southern planter. I want to emphasize that proposition. He gets nothing for them. The idea has been advanced that the weight of the hoop-iron used in the tie is paid to the planter as if it were so much cotton, but it can be demonstrated mathematically that this is not true. The Southern planter pays for the tie and then gets nothing for it in the sale of the cotton; and that I believe can be demonstrated beyond all sort of question.

I have before me an extract from a paper devoted to the interests of cotton culture and the sale of cotton. It says:

But first of all let me convince the Southern planter that he does not get one single cent paid for the bagging or ties, whether he sells his cotton here or in Liverpool. The fact is perfectly simple. Cotton is sold in the United States by gross weight. That is, if a bale of cotton weighs 450 pounds, and the price agreed upon is 10 cents a pound, the seller receives $45. In Liverpool, on the other hand, 24 pounds and sometimes 26 pounds tare is deducted, and a bale of cotton weighing 450 pounds only nets, after deducting 24 pounds, 426 pounds for which the seller is paid. This tare is deducted for the wrapping, and the iron or steel ties. Now, then, let us take the price of spot cotton of, say, September 6, both in New York and Liverpool, and we will find the problem solved. The price of spot cotton on the 6th of September in New York was 10 cents per pound, and in Liverpool it was 5 7/16d. per pound.

Proceeds of a bale of cotton weighing 450 pounds in New York, gross, at 10 cents a pound, is $45.

Proceeds of a bale of cotton weighing 450 pounds, gross, in Liverpool, deducting 24 pounds tare, or leaving 426 pounds, at 5 7/16d., is a fraction over £9 13½d., or, exchange at $4.84, is as near as possible $45.71 for the self-same bale and weight which brings in New York $45, leaving $1.71 per bale for freight and charges.

That shows beyond any sort of question, and the concurrent and universal testimony of cotton-raisers and cotton-sellers and cotton-buyers is, that these cotton-ties are an absolute loss to the planter.

So the question presents itself to the Senate, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] remarked, exactly upon all-fours with that legislation which permits the fisherman to use free salt and then sell his salted fish for the market price. The New England fisherman catches his fish, uses free salt, and then takes the salted fish to market and receives pay for the salt in the fish as well as for the fish. Why discriminate against the Southern planter, and whilst he pays for the hoop-tie and does not receive payment back under the commercial usage, why make it to him a dead loss, whilst the citizen of New England is so favored by the law that he receives the cost of the salt in the sale of the fish, although the salt itself is to him free?

Mr. President, this item, above all others in this bill, demonstrates the nature of this proposed legislation. I am not a tariff expert. I have never had a more disagreeable or burdensome duty imposed upon me in all my life than the examination of these tariff schedules and the attempt to familiarize myself with them. Circumstances, not necessary to mention, upon this side of the Chamber have imposed this duty upon some of us, who come into it for the first time; but as far as I have gone, struggling with the schedules, struggling with classifications, attempting to understand the changes in the present law and the differences between the Mills bill and the Senate bill, I am compelled to say here that, in my deliberate judgment, a more sectional and unjust piece of legislation was never attempted in the American Congress.

Why, sir, take the whole framework of this bill, and what does it amount to? The three States in the South—and it is a significant fact—which were used (and I employ no stronger term now) in 1876 to secure the Presidency are peculiarly punished in this bill. The largest reduction in it is upon sugar from Louisiana; the next largest is from South Carolina upon rice, and the next largest from Florida in the reduction of duties upon fruits and upon sponges, a peculiar production or industry (for it is both) of that State. But when we come to New England—this bill was framed by a New England Senator, as I am informed, an expert in tariff legislation—we find that the discrimination in favor of New England is so marked and distinct that any man who is not determined to see otherwise must admit it. The cotton schedule is increased; the woolen schedule is increased, and when we undertake to ana yze and dissect those schedules we find the coarser articles of cotton cloth, in which the Southern mills are now competing with New England, have no additional protection, whilst the finer cotton fabrics made in New England as a specialty have the tax upon them increased; and so in the woolen schedule; and I undertake to say that when we reach those schedules we can demonstrate beyond any doubt that the hand of sectionalism has framed all their provisions.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yesterday—I do not see him in his seat now—made an assertion here which rather astonished me, to the effect that the manufacturers of the United States were not making a profit to-day of over 5 per cent. Mr. President, it is useless in regard to an assertion of that kind to indulge in any sort of conjecture. I have before me, however, an extract from the Providence (R. I.) Journal, published in September last, giving three months' dividends upon the principal cotton and woolen mills in the New England States, and I read it for the benefit of that Senator and for his criticism, and we shall see whether the profits of the manufacturers of the United States are not over 5 per cent. Here is a proposition to take away from the Southern people, the Southern planters, a portion of the products of their labor, not profits, but a portion of what they raise out of the ground; and I shall make no further allusion than has been made to the fact that the labor of the South in the cotton culture comes from the African race.

The table of profits for three months taken from the Providence (R. I.) Journal reads as follows:

Fall River.	Capital stock.	Net profits for three months.
American Company	$400,000	$25,000
Bourne Mills	400,000	16,000
Chace Mills	500,000	10,000
Fall River Manufactory	180,000	5,400
Flint Mills	580,000	13,800
Granite Mills	400,000	24,000
Mechanics' Mills	750,000	11,500
Merchants' Manufacturing Company	800,000	16,000
Metacomet Manufacturing Company
Narragansett Mills	400,000	10,000
Richard Borden Manufacturing Company	800,000	12,000
Sagamore Manufacturing Company	600,000	18,000
Seaconnet Mills	400,000	16,000
Stafford Mills	550,000	16,500
Tecumseh Mills	500,000	10,000
Troy Cotton and Woolen Manufactory	300,000	18,000
Union Manufacturing Company	750,000	37,500
Wampanoag Mills	750,000	22,500
Weetamoe Mills	550,000	11,000

This table shows that these dividends for three months, taken from the Providence (R. I.) Journal, which, in proportion to population, is published in the wealthiest manufacturing State in the Union, ran from 12 per cent. up to 25; 12, 16, 18, 20, 24, and 25 per cent.

Mr. President, it is simply impossible that the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts can be correct. I do not pretend to say that the average profit is 25 per cent., but these are the largest manufactories in the New England States. Why, sir, I represent an agricultural State, also containing manufactures, but classed amongst the large agricultual States of the Union. What do my constituents derive from their investments in agriculture? The farmer in Missouri to-day—and Missouri is the most prosperous agricultural State in the Union, because last year we raised the largest crops of every description without a failure in any department of agriculture—the farmer in Missouri to-day who is making 2 per cent. on his investment is a phenomenally successful agriculturist.

I know that as a rule agriculture does not pay the profits that are paid by manufacturers; but when these official statements are made, showing dividends of 25 per cent., we, who are the producers, who pay these dividends not only indirectly but directly, have a right to challenge the system under which they are made. I had hoped that the necessity for anything sectional had disappeared from the politics of this country; but when the Senator from Massachusetts is here not only to defend this system but to attack all those who are opposed to it, absolute justice requires that these facts should be known.

Now, what has been the result of this system I will endeavor also to show.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will allow me to offer a resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That this Senate will proceed to a reorganization by the election of its officers on the first day of the session after the 1st day of January, 1889.

Of course that will lie on the table and go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this Senate will proceed to a reorganization by the election of its officers on the first day of the session after the 1st day of January, 1889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over under the rules.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 1407) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment upon the claim of the Old Settlers or Western Cherokee Indians; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3707) for the relief of J. A. Towle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3708) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Idaho, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. GORMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3709) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the temporary occupation and crossing of certain streets of the city of Washington and District of Columbia by the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, to meet the demands of increased travel incident to the inaugural ceremonies of March 4, 1889; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The bill (H. R. 1407) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment upon the claim of Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians was read twice by its title.

Mr. DAWES. That same bill has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate with two or three slight amendments. I move this bill be placed upon the Calendar, and when it comes up I will move those amendments to it as from the committee, and then the bill will have been substantially before the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

ACTS RELATIVE TO ELECTORAL COUNT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time, and request its immediate consideration.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, instructed to send by mail to the governor of each State printed copies of the acts of Congress passed respectively on the 3d of February, 1887, and the 19th of October, 1888, respecting the meeting of the Presidential electors and the transmission and the counting of the electoral vote for President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. McPHERSON. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may be allowed to say a word, I have been informed by more than one member of the House of Representatives and by one or two Senators that they learn from their respective States that the proper authorities there have not yet been advised of these recent laws of Congress about the time when the votes are to be sent, and what the state of the law is in regard to the governor's sending certificates of the canvasses; and therefore I thought it right that, as we have slip copies already printed, the Secretary should send at once to the governor of each State a printed copy, so that there may be no mistake made. That is all there is to it.

Mr. PLUMB. What is the necessity of so formal a proceeding as this, when a mere personal request to the superintendent of the document-room would result in having the copies sent under the frank of any Senator at the expense of the Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that there would be any difficulty in doing that, but I did not feel at liberty to ask the document-room to send copies to every governor of a State. If such a document comes from the Secretary of the Senate the governor will probably be likely to believe that that printed copy is true.

Mr. PLUMB. It opens up a pretty wide field, both of ignorance and knowledge. If these printed slips, which bear the imprimatur of the document-room, are not evidence to the mind of the governor of a State, he must be a very thick-headed person indeed, so far as that part of the case goes, but I think it would be just as well to have it done in the way I suggested as in this formal manner to governors who do not know what the laws are or what their duties are under those laws.

I do not care anything about it, but it seems to be going out of the usual and ordinary course to pass a resolution on a subject of this kind. I object to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules.

Mr. PLUMB subsequently said: I withdraw the objection I made to the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask leave to call up at this time a resolution which was reported when I was absent this morning unavoidably. I should like to have it passed to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

The following resolution, reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, directed to continue the investigation ordered to be made by the resolution of the Senate of August 3, 1888, and such committee is hereby given all the authority conferred by said resolution and power to sit during any recess of the Senate prior to December, 1889, the necessary expenses of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPOONER. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the bill (H. R. 7799) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The bill has been three times reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and was referred to the Committee on Claims inadvertently.

The Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and is hereby, directed to appoint a messenger for the Joint Committee on the Library, whose services shall be devoted exclusively to the business of said committee, and that the messenger so appointed shall be selected by the said committee.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GRAY. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. GRAY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. Therefore I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Berry,	Daniel,	McPherson,	Vance,
Bowen,	Davis,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Eustis,	Payne,	Walthall,
Cameron,	Faulkner,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Gorman,	Reagan,
Coke,	Gray,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Chace,	Frye,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,

NOT VOTING—27.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hearst,	Ransom,
Beck,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	George,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Blair,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Blodgett,	Hale,	Pasco,	Stewart,
Brown,	Hampton,	Platt,	Voorhees.
Butler,	Harris,	Quay,

So the motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. COKE.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the census of 1880 furnishes the only reliable statistics upon which to base an argument in regard to the result and effect of the manufacturing system of the United States relatively as to the whole country. That census shows that the public debt in 1880 was $2,120,000,000. Of this there were held in the nine manufacturing States $1,767,000,000; and in all the other States $353,000,000—$353,000,000 as compared with $1,767,000,000. Now, when we think that these manufacturing States, including Pennsylvania and New York, have in their entire population certainly not more than eleven million people, or twelve million at the farthest, compared with the sixty million citizens in the United States, the disproportion as to the wealth, the accumulated wealth, and the accumulating wealth, is so great as to suggest some abnormal, artificial, and unnatural causes for this difference.

It may be said that these States are old; but, Mr. President, the increase of wealth in the West in our cities has been almost phenomenal. The misfortune is that it does not belong to us. The State of Iowa, the empire agricultural State of the Northwest, and my own State of Missouri south of it, and taking the two as representative States on the alignment between the old slave and free States, I can say without any sort of vanity that they represent the largest amount of agricultural prosperity. In these States the railroads do not belong to our people. In Iowa I undertake to say that not a single railroad—perhaps that is too broad an assertion, but certainly very few of them are under the control of the people of that State. The stock is owned abroad. It is so in Missouri. To find a Missourian to-day who owns stock in a railroad would be a discovery very difficult to make; and whilst these railroads are assessed or counted or computed in the wealth of the Western States, it is a fictitious value; that is to say, it is a false valuation, and the people of those States do not own them, but they are owned by the enormous aggregations of capital in the manufacturing States of the Northeast.

Now, take the payments of interest on the public debt in the last twenty-five years. They have amounted to a total of $3,350,000,000, and that has been added in the same relative proportion to the vast aggregation of wealth in the manufacturing States of the Union. The population of the nine manufacturing States is 16,400,000, and of all the other States 46,000,000. I understated it in my remarks a few moments ago. According to the census it is 16,400,000 in the manufacturing States and 46,000,000 in the other States. Now, take the national banks, which are very sure indicia of the wealth in the respective sections.

National banks: Total number of shares of par value of $100 each, $5,517,000.
Number of shares held in the nine manufacturing States, 3,298,000.
Number held in all other States, 2,219,000.
Total capital, $551,700,000.
Portion owned in the nine manufacturing States, $329,800,000.
Portion held in all other States, $221,906,000.
Total deposits, $1,250,000,000.
In the nine manufacturing States, $700,000,000.
In all other States, $550,000,000.

Mr. President, I could go further and show from this same census of 1880 that the New England States, over and above the amount of wealth inside of their own territory, own $209,000,000 in the other States of the Union.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. To what does the Senator from Missouri attribute this vast increase of wealth in the Eastern States?

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President, my remarks have been very obscure, indeed, if there is pertinence in that question, with all respect to the Senator from New York. I ascribe it to the unjust system of taxation under these tariff laws. I ascribe it to the enormous profits made by these manufacturers who are in partnership with the Government. No better description could be given of the present condition of this country than Andrew Jackson gave to the people of the United States——

Mr. HISCOCK. Would it not be wise for the other States to step in and take the benefit of the system, as Missouri seems to be in a fair way of doing now?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, there is the fallacy of all the protection orators in this country. My State can have manufactories, but it must always be largely an agricultural region. That question is not fixed by mortal man. It has been fixed by the God that made the universe. He has stamped indelibly upon the surface of this country the nature of the pursuits of its people just as much as climatic distinctions have made the difference in production, and the difference in labor, and the difference in pursuits of the people of the earth.

Mr. HISCOCK. Naturally is Missouri more of an agricultural State than Ohio?

Mr. VEST. I should think not; but I am not certain. There are more manufactures possibly in Ohio.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will make another comparison. Is it naturally more of an agricultural State than New York?

Mr. VEST. I suppose relatively to acreage it is. It must be. I have no doubt of that. The difference between the Western States, let me say to the Senator——

Mr. HISCOCK. I believe that there are more natural resources for manufacturing in Missouri than there are in New York.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. HISCOCK. A far greater variety.

Mr. VEST. I think the natural resources of Missouri, without any State pride interfering with my judgment, are greater than those of any other State in the Union by far. That is my deliberate judgment, and I do not think at my time of life I am prejudiced or biased in regard to that opinion.

The Senator asks me, why does not Missouri share in manufacturing? Simply because the capital is in the New England States, and not with us. We are the borrowers and you are the lenders. Why ask that of a Western man, who can not go down through the streets of a single Western city without seeing placards upon almost every door, "Money to lend by the New England Saving Association," or "the Connecticut Life Insurance Company," or "the Massachusetts Deposit Company;" money to lend at 6 per cent. upon real estate, with, as a matter of course, 2 per cent. commission to the agent that effects the loan? What is the result of that to-day?

The Western States, with their enormous agricultural and mining resources, are mortgaged to the capital of New England that has been accumulated under this system of taxation, against which, as I was proceeding to say, Andrew Jackson warned his fellow-citizens in his veto message upon the extension of the charter of the Bank of the United States. That great Democrat said then, and it occurs to me in every canvass and every debate: "I warn my countrymen that there are rich men in this country who propose to become richer by using governmental power in order to put money in their pockets;" and this system is doing that identical thing to-day.

Senators ask me why my State does not go into this. Why, sir, it reminds me of a homely story of a traveler who was going through Texas at an early day and met a dilapidated old countryman, whom he employed as a guide. They went through a beautiful country, where the flowers were springing up and the cattle were grazing, and the beneficence of nature was marked upon every foot of the soil, and this old pioneer said, "I saw the time when I could have bought 3 leagues of land here for $10." "Why, in the name of Providence," said the traveler, "didn't you do it?" "I didn't have the $10," was the reply. You ask us why we do not go into manufactures. Why, Mr. President, the capital of the country has monopolized the manufactures, and it proposes to hold them.

Mr. DAWES. I am not a great business man, but I suggest to the Senator to consider this as a business proposition. If you can borrow money from the New England States at 6 per cent. and make 30 per cent. by going into manufacturing, why do you not go into that as a business proposition?

Mr. VEST. I will answer the Senator. Manufacturing is a science and an art combined. The man who takes up manufacturing without being an expert, without being raised and trained to it, is upon the road to bankruptcy as inevitably as my hand obeys my brain. It is a science, and it is an art besides. I mean it is both. New England at one time had a monopoly of commerce in this country, or of the carrying trade, until England discovered the art of making ships out of iron, and then the people of New England, whose acuteness, intellect, and energy I respect as much as any man living, immediately accepted the situation and dropped the carrying trade and took up manufactures, and to-day the balance of this country is tributary to those four millions of people, with New York and Pennsylvania added under this system; and those who oppose it labor under this disadvantage, that all the wealth, all the capital—and I speak, of course, relatively—together with intellect and energy combined, are massed together to defend the system which feeds itself by its own frauds. Those of us who oppose it, to use a homely expression, are fighting up hill. We expect to educate the people, but we are doing it against the money of the country and the mercenary instinct of the country, which is upon the other side.

It was asked me, why do my people not go into manufactures? One argument repeated ad nauseam all over this country during the canvass was, if you do not keep up the protective system all the people of the country will turn farmers; they will leave the factories and go out upon the farms in the country. A more absurd proposition was never advanced. Artillery, cavalry, and infantry could not drive them out of the cities and out of the factories. They do not want anything else. They know nothing else.

Mr. TELLER. I would ask the Senator, if these people are to stay in the cities, what are they to do if they do not manufacture? Does not the Senator know that if they cease to manufacture they must get out of the cities or starve to death?

Mr. VEST. If the money in this bill were to go to the artisans themselves it would do away with much of my objection to the legislation, bad as it is. It does not go to them. It goes to the capitalist, to the manufacturer, and there is the vice and the iniquity of the whole system. There is not one single item—I speak in all reason—in this bill in which the Senators who made it are willing to put a fair tax which will cover the labor interest of the United States—not one. It was illustrated here in the vote which we took yesterday upon steel beams and steel and iron forms. There the labor was 22.5 per cent. and the tax put on to protect American labor was 102.75 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if he means to state that in the construction of a steel beam all that the laborer gets out of it is 22 per cent.

Mr. VEST. That is the statement of the census.

Mr. TELLER. It is not the statement of the census, either.

Mr. VEST. It is.

Mr. HOAR. One of the processes the census was speaking of.

Mr. TELLER. Yes, it was one of the processes. The Senator knows that it was testified before a committee of the House by Abram S. Hewitt that that was not true; that more than 90 per cent. of it was labor.

Mr. VEST. Now, we get back to that old absurdity that the cost of labor must commence with the taking of the ore out of the ground.

Mr. TELLER. It must.

Mr. VEST. It must not, and if the Senator stands upon that he will find on reflection that it is a pure, absolute absurdity. I spoke of that the other day in the absence of the Senator, and I said then and I repeat now, that no better illustration could be had of it than this single proposition. Suppose it is proposed to protect the tailor who makes my coat, at what point in the process are you to protect him? Are you to go back to the sheep and take the wool from his back and then wash it and card it and then manufacture it, and are all these processes to be added up in the protection of the tailor, or do you not take the cost to him of the cloth, which is a finished product when it comes to his hands, and which includes all antecedent cost?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator will allow me to say that that is not an illustration at all. If he will take the clothier who made the cloth, that would be a fair illustration. If he takes the man who commences from the bottom, the man who makes cloth to sell, and then manufactures it into coats, that will do. If he has gone through all the processes to the man who takes the finished article from my hand and I protect him, that is another thing. When you protect the maker of structural beams, you protect every man below him.

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President, what is the raw material of steel beams and structural forms? Is it not the Bessemer pig-iron? Mr. Hewitt has been quoted. I have Mr. Hewitt's statement here.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose you read it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. Hewitt stated emphatically that it depended upon what point in the manufacture you commenced.

Mr. HISCOCK. No; he stated at every point in the manufacture.

Mr. VEST. When he was speaking in regard to the protection he said that depends upon the point at which you commence.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; he meant the protection you had.

Mr. TELLER. I would suggest that the Senator from Missouri read what Mr. Hewitt said.

Mr. HISCOCK. He added that in the process of manufacture, taken at every point, the labor cost over 90 per cent.; and I will say to the Senator that if he will take the tables of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, and take iron and take the labor-cost of that which enters into the production of iron and trace it through, he will find that Mr. Wright brings out about the same result.

Mr. VEST. I adhere to my proposition, and it is unanswerable. It depends entirely upon what particular manufacturer or artisan is to be protected as to the logical results of any examination or proposition upon this subject. For instance, when the manufacturer of steel beams buys his pig-iron it is a finished product to him. He pays $18 a ton for it. Does not that pay for taking it out of the ground? Does not that pay for all the intermediate processes up to that time?

Now, when you come to the protection of the steel-beam and structural-iron manufacturer, the question is, what protection will you give him? In what? In turning pig-iron into beams or structural-iron forms. How much is the labor in that process, and what is the cost of it? Is it the cost of any of these intermediate operations up to the time he buys it? No, he pays that in the $18.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the Senator makes this mistake: In adjusting the duty which is to be imposed upon the steel beam to protect that the manufacturer must have his compensation for the duty which he practically pays upon the lower product. That is the point that the Senator loses sight of.

Mr. VEST. Not at all. I do not lose sight of it. The simple proposition to me as a legislator when he asks me for a protective duty is, what has this thing cost him, and if it is $18 that he pays for the pig-iron, does not that include everything? If it does not he would not give it. Then if the cost of labor in making the beams from pig-iron is $4.09, as was agreed upon between the Knights of Labor and Mr. Carnegie in 1887 and put under seal, does not that make the whole cost $22.09?

Mr. TELLER. That was only one stage of operation in making it.

Mr. VEST. That was turning it into plain steel beams, and that is the item in this bill which I was discussing when I made those remarks, and that is a finished article. I know the Senator from Ohio—I do not say he wanted to evade the argument, but he obscured it by talking about the higher price of structural forms. That does not affect the logic of this proposition. I am talking about one specific item of taxation. I say $22.09 was the cost in making that plain steel beam, and the majority of the Senate Finance Committee propose a tax of 102.75 per cent. for protection.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me put to the Senator one other question. We will take the case of structural iron: The manufacturer commences, not with pig-iron, but with the limestone in the earth, the coal in the earth, the iron ore in the earth. He assembles them and makes his pig-iron, and goes right along up through until he brings out his structural iron. Is not that the way in which to test the amount of labor involved in his product?

Mr. VEST. That depends entirely on whether the same man does it all.

Mr. HISCOCK. In very many instances it is made in just that way.

Mr. VEST. That depends entirely on whether the same man takes the ore out of the ground and controls all the intermediate processes and then makes the structural forms. But the logic of the thing is the same.

Mr. HISCOCK. What difference does it make whether that one man does it, or whether two or three different men take part in the advancement of the iron to a higher state of manufacture?

Mr. VEST. That seems to me too plain for any sort of explanation.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to put a question.

Mr. VEST. Let me answer the Senator from New York.

Mr. HISCOCK. I should like to have my question answered.

Mr. VEST. As it seems to me, the proposition of the Senator from New York hardly needs an answer. Suppose Mr. Hewitt is demanding protection, and he pays out from his own pocket to each one of these people from the miner up; as a matter of course, he gets protection upon all of these products, or on the same product in different stages; but suppose another man steps in after the pig-iron is made and buys it, what is he protected on?

Mr. HISCOCK. Then the Senator undertakes to say that the man who commences with this material, not the very absolute raw material, and brings out a highly finished product, requires more protection, a higher degree of protection, than the man does who buys the pig-iron from somebody else who has produced it?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course he has more protection for this reason——

Mr. HISCOCK. You claim that?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, and I should be illogical and absurd if I did not. Here is a man who takes the pig-iron at $18 a ton. He ought not to be protected on anything else except that.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to suggest that he would require, perhaps, the aggregation of all the elements of protection? For instance, the ore-digger is protected and his product is the raw material of the pig-iron maker. The pig-iron maker is protected. That is another and a more advanced stage of manufacture. The pig-iron goes into the beam manufacturer's hands as raw material to him. When you aggregate the protection given to the ore-digger, the protection given to the pig-iron manufacturer, and the protection given to the beam manufacturer, you get just the result when the work is performed by the three.

Mr. HISCOCK. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is entirely mistaken. The duty which is imposed upon structural iron covers the duty that is imposed upon the raw material from which it is made, or the iron from which it is made, and in every advance of progress of manufacture up to the time that it is produced as structural iron. That one duty imposed upon the structural iron covers it all, and you are not to add that duty to intermediate duties upon the lower forms of manufacture.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to put a question to the Senator from Missouri, if it does not annoy the Senator.

Mr. VEST. Not in the slightest.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose two men take iron ore and make structural iron out of it; one of them gets his iron ore and everything else in England, and the other has his iron ore and everything else here. The structural iron is produced in England in the one case and in America in the other. Now, the amount of work performed on each is substantially the same. The proportion of cost of labor in the one and labor in the other is the same; the proportion of the raw material is the same. When you come in the end to add up the amount of labor on that raw material in the one case and in the other, the difference in wages will show the cost of the structural iron in America in the one case and in England in the other; and the proportion will be just about the same; but structural iron as a whole in England is worth a great deal less than the structural iron in America. What is the reason? It is because the wages there are less.

About two months ago I had occasion to try to find out this thing myself, and I addressed a note first to the superintendent of a pig-iron furnace, whose owner was a distinguished and leading Democrat, occupying a prominent position in the Presidential campaign for three or four Presidential campaigns, and I asked him to state to me on paper what was the raw material and what was the labor in a ton of pig-iron. He figured it out within one-tenth of 90 per cent. He did not know what use I desired to make of it. Then I got the same thing from a structural-iron furnace in Cleveland. I asked them from their books to tell me what in the structural iron they built was raw material and what was labor, and it came out just about the same, not a difference of one-tenth.

Mr. VEST. I will reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, but I do not see how it touches the proposition I am discussing. In England pig-iron is worth about $12.50 a ton and in the United States about $18, a difference of five dollars and a half.

Mr. TELLER. What makes the difference?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course the difference arises from the price of labor and the price of ore and the difference in the work. All these enter into that consideration. I do not propose to go into all the details as a matter of argument, but I am simply stating results. I say the Englishman who pays twelve and a half dollars a ton on pig-iron pays all the expense up to that time. Does any Senator deny that? I say the American who pays $18 pays all the expense up to that time, and to him the American pig-iron is a finished product. Now suppose he stores it right there after he had paid $18 a ton, is not that the end of the operation? Has he not got his goods and paid his money? Is not the man who dug it out of the ground paid? Is not the man who worked it in the furnace paid? Is not the man who owned the ore paid by the purchaser? Is not that the end of it? How does it change the logic of the proposition to say it goes further and is made into structural forms and steel beams? Right there commences a new industry, right there commences a new protection according to the desire of Senators upon the other side, and in this bill is that item, protection on steel beams and structural forms in iron or steel.

I undertook to find out what is the cost of labor in changing pig-iron into these steel beams and forms, and I find that it is $5.33 a ton. I say I am willing, in order to protect American labor, which is the shibboleth of the protection party, to give you a protection of $10, but you will not take it.

Mr. TELLER. Five.

Mr. VEST. I will give five or ten; I will give ten and compromise on it; but that will not do. You must have 102.75 per cent. Now, after you have protected American labor and paid it off, where does the balance of the money go?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. VEST. Oh, no; it is no interruption.

Mr. HISCOCK. I repeat that I understand the Senator to say this: That the manufacturer of structural iron who commences with the ore, with the limestone, and with the coal can not compete practically; that there is less labor-cost in his structural iron to him than there is to the man who buys the pig-iron or buys iron in the last advanced stage of manufacture previous to its being used for structural iron.

Mr. VEST. I do not say that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the Senator to say that a little while ago.

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the Senator if that is not the logic of his position?

Mr. VEST. Not at all. They both pay the same unless one has additional advantages or facilities.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it not true that if the manufacturer makes from the absolute raw material in the earth the finished product, advancing it in his own shop from raw material up to that point, you are compelled to take into consideration as his labor-cost all that it has cost him to dig the ore from the earth, the coal from the earth, and the limestone from the quarry?

Mr. VEST. Mr. Hewitt, who manages every process, according to the Senator from New York, I presume pays just as much to the miner as the other man who simply makes the pig-iron and stops there. If Mr. Hewitt makes structural iron out of the pig-iron and manages the whole process from digging it out of the ground until the structural iron is made, the only difference between Mr. Hewitt and his competitors is just the difference in handling, because he handles it all himself.

Mr. HISCOCK. I agree to that.

Mr. VEST. Whereas the pig-iron would be taken to some other person——

Mr. HISCOCK. The question I ask is what is the labor cost in that structural iron, commencing back at the point at which I have asked the Senator to start?

Mr. VEST. I know I could very easily tell the Senator, but I have not counted it——

Mr. HISCOCK. Does it not include the labor-cost of the pig-iron?

Mr. VEST. The whole cost is included, up to the state of pig-iron, in the $18 paid for that.

Mr. HISCOCK. I grant that the $18 is paid for it, but I say in reply to that as I did to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that these duties are not piled one upon the other, but the last duty upon the more highly finished product is intended only to compensate for the increased labor-cost in advancing the article to that last stage.

Mr. VEST. That is from pig-iron to structural forms.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is just enough higher above the duty upon pig-iron, if that is the raw material, to compensate for the labor-cost in manufacturing it from pig-iron into structural iron. That is the theory of the tariff, and it is upon that theory that this bill is constructed.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to say that I desired to state a minute ago, if I did not, that they were all aggregated in the final duty?

Mr. HISCOCK. They are all aggregated in the final duty.

Mr. HARRIS. All aggregated in the duty on the finished product.

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; and I repeat what I said, that the duty upon pig-iron compensates for the labor-cost upon it; the duty upon the more finished product, upon the advancement of pig-iron to a higher stage of manufacture, the advanced duty upon that only compensates for the additional labor that goes in for the advancement of the product above the pig-iron state; and so on you go until you reach the highest product of either iron or steel.

Mr. VEST. This bill provides for a duty upon pig-iron. The Senator from New York certainly does not mean to say he would put that again in the duty on structural iron, does he?

Mr. HISCOCK. No; I mean to say, and I thought I made it clear——

Mr. VEST. I thought I made it clear.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not think the Senator made it clear.

Mr. VEST. Very good; that is a difference of opinion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly he did not to me. What I have been attempting to enforce is precisely what has been said by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that the final duty upon the more highly-finished product is simply the aggregation of the duties upon the iron in its different stages of advancement up to that finished product, at each stage there being a sufficient increase in the duty to compensate for the increased labor that has been expended in the advancement.

Mr. VEST. If this bill is framed upon that basis, it is an unjust and outrageous bill; it is a bill that imposes double and treble taxation.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. VEST. More than that. Does the Senator mean to say—and I put the question to him distinctly—here we have a protective duty in order to protect pig-iron; is not that finished? Is not that complete? What right has he then to take that same duty and put it in the final result when that pig-iron is made into structural iron?

Mr. HISCOCK. For the reason that the man who buys the pig-iron out of which to make his structural iron has been compelled to pay that to the man from whom he purchased it. That is the reason why we do it. In the purchase price which he pays for it he really compensates the producer of the pig-iron for the money which he expended in the production of the pig-iron. That is the reason why it is done.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I may be very obtuse, but it seems to me that the $18 on the pig-iron pays everything.

Mr. HISCOCK. It does pay everything on that, but it enters into the cost of the pig-iron. That I grant. Whatever the labor-cost there is in it enters into its price as a matter of course. When the man who makes structural iron buys it, he then returns in the price he pays for it to the man who produces the pig-iron the labor-cost of that pig-iron. So when you trace it through you will find the labor-cost through all the stages up is really returned to the man who makes the lower product. So far as the advanced stage of manufacture is concerned you will find it returned to him by the man who in the end uses it for the more highly finished product.

Mr. VEST. We will test this question again on steel rails, and if the Senator will take a pencil and piece of paper and dissect the selling price of structural iron in this country he will find it is $18 on pig-iron; then the cost of labor, then the profit to the producer of the structural form of the steel beam, and that makes the price. That is a mathematical proposition, and it needs no logic or argument about it.

I wanted to read, although it is not exactly applicable to this schedule, but in the line of the somewhat desultory argument going on, the testimony of a gentleman who figured very largely in this last canvass. Allusion has been made to a prominent Democrat in connection with protection—I suppose Mr. Hewitt; but here is a gentleman very well known in the United States. The Senator from Massachusetts knows him. He delivered some burning orations in the last canvass, and this illustrates how the tariff operates. This gentleman denounced Cleveland all over the United States on the tariff question, and I think did us as much harm, or more, in some directions, than any other adherent of the Republican party. I allude to General Ben. Butler. He made a speech in 1882, and I quote from it. I want to show the operation of the tariff from one of its own defenders now.

> I am one of the largest woolen manufacturers in the United States. I do not say this boastingly, but to show that I am not selfish in the views I hold. The cloth I wear [placing his hand on his coat-sleeve] is of my own manufacture, and I notice several gentlemen around me who wear the same. On these goods there is a tariff of 60 per cent. Republican orators and newspapers tell you this tariff is to protect the mill laborers. Twenty per cent. will pay our entire labor expenses. What do you suppose becomes of the other 40 per cent.?

That is the question; that is the burning question on all these schedules, what becomes of the other 40 per cent.?

> These same Republican orators and newspapers tell you it goes into the United States Treasury. Not a dollar reaches there. Every cent goes into my pocket. [Slapping his hand on his pocket vigorously to give emphasis to his words.] And every one of you is paying this bounty to the woolen manufacturers. The whole tariff scheme is an imposition and a fraud on the American people.

Mr. MCPHERSON. When was that?

Mr. VEST. In 1882. General Butler, I believe, was then opposed to the Republican party.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. COKE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to say that while I shall vote for the amendment, I do not want it understood by that vote that I believe that a duty of 35 per cent. ought to be imposed upon cotton-ties and that class of goods. I believe they ought to be upon the free-list, but I shall vote for the amendment because it is the only relief possible now, I suppose, to be had. I do not want my vote, therefore, to be misunderstood on that point.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I do not see him in his seat and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who was called home last night, requested me to pair with him for the day that he expected to be absent. I will, therefore, announce the pair. I should vote "yea" if the Senator from Rhode Island were present.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If I were at liberty to vote on this question I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but have transferred that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]; therefore I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Eustis,	Pugh,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Ransom,	Vest,
Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Colquitt,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the substitute will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read paragraphs 138 and 139, as follows:

138. Nails.—Cut nails and cut spikes of iron or steel, 1 cent per pound.

139. Horseshoe nails, hob nails, and all other wrought iron or steel nails, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this item 139 is put back to the present existing rate of duty, whilst the Mills bill or House bill reduced it to 47.66 per cent. I simply want to say that this is one of the articles that enter into the daily life of the people of the United States, especially in the agricultural districts. It is as far removed from an article of luxury as any domestic manufacture in the United States can possibly be; and I want to call attention to the fact that under the census of 1880 iron nails, spikes, cut or wrought, which is this article, is stated at $5,629,240 as the product and $1,255,171 for labor, being a relative per cent. or proportion of the labor used in the manufacture of 22.3 per cent. Now the duty the committee insist upon is 76.26 per cent.

The margin is beyond all reason. It is out of proportion to what justice would demand, and especially for an article of this kind, and I shall move, therefore, as the proper way to bring up the question, to strike out 76.26 per cent. and insert 47.66.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be reported. Will the Senator from Missouri indicate the line?

Mr. VEST. I used the ad valorem rate, but I want to put it back to 2½ cents a pound, which is the amount in the House bill. I move to strike out "4 cents per pound" and insert "2½." I have not the bill before me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 139, line 502, it is proposed to strike out "4," and insert "2½;" so as to read:

139. Horseshoe nails, hob nails, and all other wrought iron or steel nails, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. President, as I understood the Senator from Missouri, he restated that which he has been contending for as to the amount of labor which enters into the labor cost of these nails. After the free discussion which we had a few moments ago upon another item in the bill, I hardly think it worth while for me to restate the position I occupy in reference to that; which is that in the labor cost of these nails we must take into account all the labor which is involved in the production of all the materials in the different processes of advancement until the product is delivered as the nails described in this case.

The evidence before the committee which prepared this bill was that according to the price the manufacturers of these nails are compelled to pay for the raw material out of which they are manufactured, a reduction of their protection as proposed in the House bill would absolutely destroy the industry in the United States, and on that question there was no conflict of evidence whatever. As the Senate can well see, if the duties are to be maintained upon the iron and steel schedule up to the point we have now reached, that must be the case. No reduction has been made upon the class of raw material from which these nails are made, and therefore the committee recommended the holding of this item as in the present law.

I may add, that while there is not a large importation of these nails into this country, there is some considerable importation of them coming from Canada, and they are sharply competing with the manufacturers in the Northern States near the line of Canada in the production.

Mr. VEST. I notice, Mr. President, in item 138, "cut nails and cut spikes of iron or steel," the duty on which in the existing law is 1¼ cents per pound and which is reduced in the House bill to 1 cent per pound with the same reduction in the Senate bill, but when it comes to "horseshoe nails, hob nails, and all other wrought iron or steel nails, not specially enumerated," on which the existing duty is 4 cents per pound and which the House bill reduces to 2½ cents per pound, the duty of 4 cents a pound is retained by the Senate bill. I must confess frankly that I have not had time to read the testimony. I have been as industrious as I could, but I am not able to state or conjecture why that difference is made.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say in explanation, so far as that provision is concerned, that machinery enters so much more into the manufacture of the articles in the first item referred to that it was concluded that a reduction should be made at that point, and in reference to the next clause that a reduction should not be made.

Mr. VEST. Without having had my attention directly called to it, I have been under the impression that machinery was used in the manufacture of all these nails.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is; but, as I stated, after a careful investigation it was concluded that a discrimination should be made between the two, and as to one the reduction could be made and as to the other it could not be.

Mr. VEST. The testimony that was given before that committee of course came from interested parties; and under a familiar rule of law it is to be looked upon with a great deal of allowance, if not suspicion. Horseshoe nails and hob nails, which are used by the common people of the country for every-day purposes and in the blacksmith shops out in my country in the West, are matters of prime necessity. The enormous quantity of 63,006 pounds—of course I speak sarcastically—amounting in value to $3,305.18, was imported into this country in 1887.

It is not a very great matter to anybody else, but it is of very considerable importance to the people out in the West especially, who are obliged to have this particular article—of course it is used North, West, East, and South. It seems to me, without arguing the principle at all, that it ought to be put back to 2½ cents a pound.

I shall not go back to the argument between the Senator from New York and myself as to the cost of labor and how the duty ought to be imposed. He is very wrong or I am very wrong, but we are certainly very far apart on that proposition.

I understand that the man who made this iron had his protective duty, and when it left his hands it left them as a finished product, and then the manufacturer who puts it into these nails also is protected; and to go back to consider the cost of labor from the time that iron came out of the mine and add it to the manufacturer's protection is simply to accumulate duty upon duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I failed to announce on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], voted upon this morning, the pair between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] and myself. If he had been present, I should have voted "yea," and the Senator from Oregon would have voted "nay." I vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. I desire this announcement to apply to all the yea-and-nay votes taken during the day.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I agreed yesterday to pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] during this day. I understand the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] is absent and without a pair. I therefore transfer the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island to the Senator from South Carolina, and I vote "yea."

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. MANDERSON. I again announce my pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALTHALL (after having voted in the affirmative). May I ask if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. WALTHALL. Then I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bate,	Eustis,	Pugh,	Vest,
Berry,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Colquitt,	Morgan,	Turpie,
Daniel,	Payne,	Vance,

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Chace,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Chandler,	Evarts,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Frye,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,
Davis,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—31.

Aldrich,	Call,	Hampton,	Platt,
Beck,	Cameron,	Hearst,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Farwell,	Hiscock,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Faulkner,	Jones of Arkansas.	Sabin,
Blodgett,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Spooner,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Brown,	Gray,	Manderson,	Walthall.
Butler,	Hale,	Pasco,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

140. Wire nails made of wrought iron or steel, 2 inches and longer, not lighter than No. 12 wire gauge, 2 cents per pound; from 1 inch to 2 inches in length, and lighter than No. 12 and not lighter than No. 16 wire gauge, 2½ cents per pound; shorter than 1 inch and lighter than No. 16 wire gauge, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. I should like to know from the committee why it is that they make such a distinction as to these iron nails. In one item, "1 inch to 2 inches in length, and lighter than No. 12 and not lighter than No. 16 wire gauge," they retain the duty as in the House bill. In the preceding paragraph, on "2 inches and longer, not lighter than No. 12 wire gauge," they reduce even below the House bill, a half cent. In the existing law it is 4 cents; in the House bill 2½ cents: in the Senate substitute 2 cents, and upon the last item, "shorter than 1 inch and lighter than No. 16 wire gauge," which in the existing law is 4 cents a pound, the House bill reduces it 2½ cents, and the Senate committee put it back to 4 cents a pound. This is all a matter of machine work, and why is this distinction made?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator alludes to the House bill. The House bill leaves the larger size of nails at 2½ cents a pound, and the smaller size it reduces to 2½ cents a pound. It is more expensive to make a pound of nails shorter than an inch and lighter than No. 16 wire gauge than it is the larger size. We have graded these nails somewhat according to their size. I think the Senator will find it all right if he will look at it carefully.

Mr. VEST. If that be so, how does the Senator explain the first item, which is 2 inches and longer, not lighter than No. 12 wire gauge? That is reduced from 4 cents to 2 cents a pound, and in the last item 4 cents a pound is put upon the smaller nails, shorter than 1 inch and lighter than No. 16 wire gauge, which is kept at 4 cents.

I suppose there is some technical reason for it, but I can not understand, when the nails are made in the same factory and with the same machinery, that there is such a difference of duty as from 4 cents to 2½ cents and in the other case the duty is retained upon a still larger nail. If the argument of the Senator from Iowa holds, it ought to apply to all these items.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that the committee in looking this matter over believed 2 cents a pound was high enough for the larger-sized nails, and therefore we reduced the duty; and these small nails we supposed were more expensive to manufacture, and so we retained the old rate. That is a repetition, perhaps, of what I said before, but that is the best answer I can give to the Senator.

Mr. VEST. I will not make the motion which I intended in regard to it, although it seems to me the items are not consistent with each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

141. Railway-bars, made of iron and steel, and railway-bars made in part of steel, T-rails, and punched iron or steel flat rails, seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. VANCE. I move, in line 512, to strike out "seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound" and insert "$11 per ton."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 512, after the word "rails," it is proposed to strike out the words "seven-tenths of 1 cent per pound" and insert "$11 per ton;" so as to read:

141. Railway-bars, made of iron and steel, and railway-bars made in part of steel, T-rails, and punched iron or steel flat rails, $11 per ton.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should be very much pleased indeed if some member of the committee, the chairman for instance, would give me some reason why this duty should be maintained at the rate of $15.68 per ton. I have learned something of the operations of railroads and their history in past years in the purchase of iron and steel rails. I was recently informed of a transaction that occurred between a certain railroad corporation and a certain manufacturing establishment in this country for the manufacture of iron and steel rails, where a large purchase and sale of these rails was made, consisting of 30,000 or 40,000 tons, I think, in one operation, at $31 per ton.

The rate, as I understood, on the same day free on board at London or Liverpool, in a foreign market, was $20 per ton, to which the addition of the $11 per ton proposed by the Senator from North Carolina would meet exactly the transaction itself, the foreign cost plus the protection which the Senator from North Carolina proposes to afford. If rails can be manufactured and sold at a profit at $31 per ton, why give the combination of steel-rail manufacturers of this country $4.68 additional bounty? That is the question I rose to ask; why give them more bounty than they need to protect them? They certainly have protection enough at $11 when they make a sale of rails at $31 a ton. Why give them $4.68 a ton more?

In looking at this duty I find that the protection has been ample, and that during the past year there was only collected out of the great number of millions of dollars' worth of steel rails bought in this country for new structures, for repairs, for renewals, and for all purposes on 130,000 miles of railroad in the United States, less than a million of dollars, when in 1887, at these high rates of duty, the value of the entire product was only $998,096. It seems to me as though a less rate of duty would be amply sufficient; and when you come to consider that for every increase of duty here given, under the great steel and iron rail combinations which have been formed in this country and which, as I believe, own the patents for the manufacture of this product—when you come to add that increase of duty and consider that every increase of cost in that way adds to every item of transportation, both of passengers and freight, and the moving of products all over this country, for certainly some consideration must be given to the investors in railroad property and to the cost of road-bed and the cost of machinery which pulls the train, in making up a statement of this kind and in making up a tariff bill—if, I say, $11 a ton does represent, and I think I speak correctly when I say broadly it does represent, the difference in cost here and abroad thoroughly and fully. I not only speak of the labor-cost, but I speak of the other ingredients that enter into the cost, for certainly the labor-cost in making a ton of iron rails is very insignificant as compared with $15.68 per ton which is here afforded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I announce the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] and record my vote "yea."

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], or I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. My colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FRYE (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote and announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. I will announce this once for all now. As both are absent from the Senate and will be gone for the day, I need not announce it again.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Eustis,	Reagan,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Gray,	Saulsbury,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Turpie,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	McPherson,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Ransom,	Vest,

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Chace,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Teller,
Chandler,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Davis,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Dolph,	Paddock,	Stewart,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Hale,	Payne,
Beck,	Dawes,	Hampton,	Platt,
Blackburn,	Edmunds,	Hearst,	Pugh,
Blair,	Evarts,	Hiscock,	Quay,
Blodgett,	Farwell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Brown,	Frye,	Kenna,	Stanford.
Butler,	George,	Manderson,
Call,	Gibson,	Morgan,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Pasco,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I now move to strike out, in line 512, the word "seven-tenths" and insert "six-tenths."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 141, line 512, it is proposed to strike out "seven" and insert "six;" so as to read:

141. Railway bars, made of iron and steel, and railway bars made in part of steel, T-rails, and punched iron or steel flat rails, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That will just about divide the difference between the two propositions; one is $11 per ton, the other is $15.68, while this is $13.44 a ton.

Mr. VEST. I intended to make a motion to fix this duty at $12 a ton, and I want to state that this is the most important portion of the bill, for the reason that this tax is imposed upon every pound of freight that is carried by the railroads of the United States.

The great question to the people of my State, the large grain-growing region of the country, is as to the transportation of grain to the seaboard. We compete with our corn and wheat in the free-trade markets of the world, and every cent of transportation comes directly, to all intents and purposes, out of the farmers of the great West. It is true the railroads pay these iron and steel manufacturers for their rails, but they immediately assess the price upon the producers in the great grain-growing States of the Northwest, and with interest. So this question is one directly affecting to an enormous extent my own constituents. This is a very great interest. There is no single item in this bill that involves as much value as the one we are now considering.

The census of 1880 shows that there were engaged in that year in this business 7,224 hands, receiving $3,286,900 in wages at $455 to the hand, or $1.45 a day, excluding Sundays. In 1887 the output was two and one-half times more than in 1880, and I will come to those figures in a moment. The duty now is 84.33 per cent. ad valorem, amounting to $17 a ton; the duty under the Senate substitute is 63.59 per cent. ad valorem, amounting to $15.68 a ton, whilst the House bill reduces it to $11 a ton.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his leave.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to ask the Senator if he believes as a result of his observation and reading that the cost of railroad transportation in this country at present bears any relation whatever to the cost of the railroad?

Mr. VEST. That question is a very difficult one to answer.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Senator's proposition to be that the cost of these rails comes out of the Western farmer, involving an opinion on the question I put.

Mr. VEST. I make that statement, and I do not think it can be successfully contradicted, although it is not susceptible of that logical analysis which other propositions might be submitted to. But it goes without saying that when the railroads pay for these steel rails they collect the additional cost or whatever the cost may be off the man that puts his freight upon the road, just as the importer puts the cost of the tariff tax, his gate-money to get into the markets of the United States, either to the full extent or to a less extent, varying with the conditions, upon the consumer.

The Senator from Massachusetts asked me a question which no mortal man can answer, for the reason that the railroads of the country, a great many of them, are managed upon what you might call a fictitious basis, with watered stock, without any reference to the value or cost of the road; but the proposition which is not touched by his question is this: That when a railroad pays so much for steel rails it gets it back; and how does it get it back? The roads must get it back from their customers, and their customers are my constituents, a portion of the grain-growing people of this country.

The price paid for steel rails in 1887—I think it was smaller in 1888—was $37.12½ a ton in the United States; in Liverpool the price was $21.10, making the price of laying down a ton of steel rails in the United States $40.50. That is to say, the duty, $17 a ton, and the freight, $2.50 a ton, added so much to the cost; and but for this duty of $17 a ton the English-made rails would cost here $23.60. The price for which the American rail was sold was $37.50. The production in the United States for 1887 was 1,749,888 tons, making a cost over and above the English rails in the aggregate to the consumers in this country of $27,731,602. In 1887 the number of men employed in the Bessemer pig-iron works was 7,147, and Bessemer pig-iron was worth $18 per ton. In the same year the English Bessemer pig-iron sold for $12.50 a ton, being a difference of $6.50 between the foreign and domestic article.

The cost of labor as agreed upon between the Knights of Labor and the Edgar Thomson Works in 1887 was $4.09, in converting the Bessemer pig-iron into steel rails. Now, if we allow 50 per cent., or $2, to cover the difference between labor in the United States and England, it would make the difference in pig-iron and labor, taking into consideration also the cost of the pig-iron in the two countries, $7.50; but we must take from these $2 for freight, which as a matter of course is a protective duty to that extent upon the article imported, and that would leave $5.50 a ton as the difference between the cost of pig-iron and the labor between the two countries. The cost of a ton of steel rails at the Edgar Thomson Works in 1887, according to that statement, was $26.79. If we give to these people $5 profit, which is a reasonable and a large one, it would make the cost of a ton of iron rails with the profit added $31.79—$5 a ton on the quantity of steel rails for 1887 produced in the United States makes $10,248,190; but the average price for 1887 was not $31.79; it was $37.12½, and that would make the profit for 1887 $21,171,760.

As a matter of course, out of that is to be taken the interest upon the plant and the cost of superintendence and clerks, etc., and still it left an enormous amount to be divided between the ten or twelve manufacturers, as there were in 1887, who controlled the market absolutely. Whether they had an actual trust—although I believe they had—is not pertinent now to what I state. They controlled the market and this was the amount that was divided between them.

Now, as a matter of course, if the Senator from New York is correct, the cost of turning the pig-iron into the steel rails is not $4.09, as the Knights of Labor thought, but it must go back and include all the cost of labor in the original processes from the time the iron came out of the mines.

We are confronted in all these items with the difference between him and myself on that propcsition, and if he is correct my argument goes for nothing; if I am correct this duty is enormous beyond all question. If there is more than a mere pretense when our friends upon that side of the Chamber say that their idea in this taxation is to protect American labor, there is an enormous surplus here over and above any reasonable protection to American labor, divided amongst these gentlemen year by year, which the laborer never sees and by no possibility can reach.

It was stated by a very reputable gentleman publicly in another branch of this Congress that Mr. Carnegie admitted his profits to be $1,500,000 in a single year. I have no doubt but that his profits are enormous; that they must be enormous is beyond any sort of question.

Therefore I shall vote for this or any other amendment which reduces this tax.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire further to state in respect to this matter that the Senator from Missouri has not stated all the protection that the steel and iron combination have. They are also protected by patents. No other corporation, no individual can come in and manufacture the steel and iron used in this country.

Mr. PLUMB. Would the Bessemer patent be a protection against foreign importation?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know that it would.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to say to the Senator that these steel-rail manufacturers are not protected by patents. All the patents have expired, but there is one process, I believe, that is still patented, and where parties use that process they pay a dollar a ton. All the other patents have expired.

Mr. McPHERSON. I had supposed myself that that was correct until I read the testimony that was taken before the committee and it surprised me somewhat, and that is the reason I raised the point.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator read the testimony?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will; it is on page 149, where the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asked the question of Mr. Wolff:

Is not the basic process covered by patents?

The basic process for the manufacture of steel—and I suppose it applies to iron rails as much as to billets or ingots—and Mr. Wolff answered:

Yes, sir; and American steel manufacturers own it, and we can not work it.
Mr. SWANK. Anybody can get in.
Senator BECK. It is covered by patents.
Mr. SWANK. You can get in by buying in; they own the patents.
Oh, yes—

Says Mr. Wolff—

the steel manufacturers own the patent.
Mr. SWANK. Anybody can get in by paying a royalty.

Now, the question is, who fixes the royalty? The American Steel and Iron Association fixed the royalty, and they may fix it at so high a rate that they will not permit any other manufacture at all. I will read further:

Senator BECK. I asked this man a question whether it was covered by a patent, and he said it was, and now I understand Mr. Swank to contradict him.
Mr. SWANK. It has been asserted time and again that no person except the corporations owning the patent can make basic steel. I wish to say that they can do so by paying a royalty.

That was my opinion.

Mr. ALLISON. I have later information than that.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Wolff replies:

The gentleman here says that there is nobody making it in this country.

I do not know but that there may be a distinction between what is known as basic steel. Perhaps this applies to some particular purpose, but I understood when I commenced to read it that it was the basic process under which the steel is made.

Mr. ALLISON. No.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then there was some mistake in the print or some mistake in answering the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that the basic process is not that. The patents have all expired; but there is a patent process for basic steel, and the uniform royalty is a dollar a ton, but that is used very greatly in this country.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion, because it seems to me that the amount I have proposed affords a sufficient protection, and it is a compromise between the two bills, the House bill and the Senate bill, $13.44 per ton.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. Otherwise I should vote "yea."

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], or I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Vance,
Berry,	Gorman,	Ransom,	Vest,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.

Brown,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Butler,	George,	Pasco,	Voorhees.
Call,	Gibson,	Payne,
Cameron,	Hale,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read paragraphs 142, 143, and 144, as follows:

142. Railway fish-plates or splice-bars, made of iron or steel, 1 cent per pound.
143. Rivets of iron or steel, 2½ cents per pound.
144. Sheets, of iron or steel, common or black, including all iron or steel commercially known as common or black taggers' iron or steel, and skelp iron or steel; valued at 3 cents per pound or less: Thinner than No. 10 and not thinner than No. 20 wire gauge, 1.1 cents per pound; thinner than No. 20 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 25 wire gauge, 1.2 cents per pound; thinner than No. 25 wire gauge and not thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.4 cents per pound; thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 1.5 cents per pound: Provided, That all common or black sheet-iron or sheet-steel not thinner than No. 10 wire gauge shall pay a duty as plate-iron or plate-steel.

Mr. McPHERSON. I see there is no change made in the existing law with respect to any of the kinds of manufactures named in paragraph 144 except in the last item, "thinner than No. 29 wire gauge." The present law imposes a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, and there seems to be an increase here to 64 per cent., more than double. The duty is doubled, and 4.25 per cent. added. I should like to know what the particular necessity is for that.

Mr. VANCE. In one particular I think it will increase the amount of the revenue. Under the present law there were imported last year 6,295,027 pounds, which paid a duty of $44,062.49. By the Senate bill this importation would have to pay a duty of $94,425.41, being an increase of $50,362.92 on this one item, or more than 116 per cent. over the present amount of duty. I can see no reason in the world for this increase, except simply to reduce the revenue under the protective system, reduce the revenue of the people I mean, not the revenue of the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it probable that under the proposed rate of duty the importations will not be quite so large.

Mr. VANCE. I understand that. That is the regular protective idea, to reduce the revenue in the Treasury by making the duty prohibitory; put all the tax upon the people and increase the revenue of the men who make the sheet-iron! That is the idea, and the bill is consistent with that idea.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I understand the answer of the Senator from Iowa, it is proposed to make a prohibitory tariff on this particular article.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir. I think the Senator does not understand me. Under the existing tariff these sheets "thinner than No. 29 wire gauge" come in at 30 per cent. ad valorem; that is, at a rate which prevents our own producers or manufacturers from making this kind of sheet-iron; and it is to enable them to compete with the foreign producer that we have placed them on an equality with other classes of sheet-iron and steel.

Mr. VANCE. I move to amend by restoring the old duty on sheet-iron "thinner than No. 29 wire gauge," the duty now being 30 per cent., and the proposed bill is to make it 64.25. I move to strike out "1.5 cents per pound" and insert "30 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 527 it is proposed to strike out the words "1.5 cents per pound" and insert "30 per cent. ad valorem;" so as to read:

Thinner than No. 29 wire gauge, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has been called out of the Senate Chamber for a short time and will return very soon. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. BATE (when Mr. FAULKNER's name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], or I should vote "nay."

Mr. BERRY (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, was called). My colleague [Mr. JONES, of Arkansas], if present, would vote "yea." He is paired on this vote with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

The roll-call being concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Gorman,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Berry,	Gray,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Blackburn,	Harris,	Turpie,
Coke,	McPherson,	Vance,
Eustis,	Morgan,	Vest,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Frye,	Paddock,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Davis,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Teller,
Dawes,	Manderson,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Evarts,	Morrill,	Spooner,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich	Chandler,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Beck,	Cockrell,	Hearst,	Quay,
Blair,	Colquitt,	Hiscock,	Ransom,
Blodgett,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Riddleberger,

Butler,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Voorhees.
Call,	George,	Pasco,
Cameron,	Gibson,	Payne,
Chace,	Hale,	Platt,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read paragraph 145, as follows:

145. Sheets, of iron or steel, corrugated or crimped, 1.4 cents per pound: Provided, That on all iron or steel sheets or plates, and on all hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel, excepting on what are known commercially as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, and hereafter provided for, when galvanized or coated with zinc or spelter, or other metals, or any alloy of those metals, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound additional duty shall be paid.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that that paragraph 145 may be passed over for the present, and I ask the same in respect to paragraph 147. I ask unanimous consent for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, if there be no objection. The next paragraph will be read.

The Chief Clerk read paragraph 146, as follows:

146. Sheet-iron or sheet-steel, polished, planished, or glanced, by whatever name designated, 2½ cents per pound: Provided, That plate or sheet or taggers' iron or steel, by whatever name designated, other than the polished, planished, or glanced herein provided for, which has been pickled or cleaned by acid or by any other material or process, or which is cold-rolled, shall pay one-quarter of 1 cent per pound more duty than the corresponding gauges of common or black sheet or taggers' iron or steel.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that paragraph 147 be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraph 147 will be read and passed over.

The Chief Clerk read paragraph 147, as follows:

147. Sheets or plates, of iron or steel, or taggers' iron or steel coated with tin or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. McPHERSON. I call the attention of the committee to paragraph 144, "thinner than No. 29 wire gauge." There seems to be an increase of duty from 41.60 to 88.14. Is that for the same reason that the Senator gave me a few days ago, to increase the production in this country?

Mr. VANCE. The Senator from New Jersey will allow me to read a little testimony taken by the Subcommittee on Finance on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield.

Mr. VANCE. A gentleman by the name of W. H. Ainey, who appeared as the president of the Lehigh Iron Company, at Allentown, Pa., came before that committee, and his ideas in regard to the proprieties of protection and the methods of their application, I think, fully answer the questions of the Senator from New Jersey, so that he need not trouble the Senators who have this bill in charge. Mr. Ainey says:

Protection to American industries, if it has an object, would preserve our American markets for our home products.

When foreign products come into our markets and exclude an equal quantity of home product, the effect on the latter is the same whether it comes in free of duty or only pays a duty which enables it to displace the home product.

Hence, the actual importation of commodities which can and ought to be made here furnishes Congress at all times a safe and reliable guide for the protection of our American industries.

We used in 1887 of iron and steel 8,230,399 tons; we imported in 1887 of iron and steel 1,783,251 tons. Of the latter, 780,940 tons were pig and scrap iron, and 1,002,311 tons were manufactured iron and steel.

We could and should have made every ton of the 1,783,251 tons imported, and would have made it if adequately protected.

So anything that admits of importation at all needs protection and calls for the exercise of the protective power. There were only 6,074 pounds of these species of pickled or planished iron imported last year, and that calls for an increase of duty in order that it may not come in.

I move to amend, in paragraph 146, the line relating to sheet-iron "thinner than No. 29 wire gauge," by striking out "1.75 cents per pound," etc., and inserting "30 per cent. ad valorem and one-fourth of a cent per pound."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words stated do not occur in paragraph 146.

Mr. VANCE. The analysis made by the Senate committee does not seem to correspond exactly at this point with the language of the bill. I will not detain the Senate with this matter. I will investigate and see where I can offer my amendment with propriety and ask permission to recur to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator that paragraph 146 is the existing law, as is also the Mills bill, so that I do not suppose he cares to offer any amendment to that.

Mr. McPHERSON. Of taggers' iron or steel, which is enumerated in this paragraph 146, on which the present duty is 30 per cent. ad valorem and one-fourth of a cent per pound, the entire value of the importation in 1887 was $13,486. The duty has been here raised and an ad valorem duty under existing law from 39.18 per cent. to 64.24 per cent.——

Mr. ALLISON. What paragraph?

Mr. McPHERSON. I find it in the comparative statement made by the Treasury Department as to paragraph 146, and it is designated in the comparative statement made by the Treasury as taggers' iron and steel, of which the importations were as little as I mentioned, $13,486, showing that there was but very little importation; and therefore I presume the home manufacturers have the home market exclusively to themselves. I ask what the necessity was for increasing that duty from 39.18 per cent. to 64.24 per cent., when the home manufacturer already has the market?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the question now. Under the existing law this class of taggers' iron and steel pays 30 per cent. ad valorem, as in the paragraph we discussed a moment ago, and a quarter of a cent a pound additional; and this is to correct that inequality in the existing law. I should say also to the Senator that paragraph 146 is the existing law. It is made to apply to steel as well as to iron. Steel is included now in paragraph 146, whereas under the existing law iron only is included.

Mr. VANCE. I think that by striking out the proviso in paragraph 146 my object will be accomplished.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out of paragraph 146 the words which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "pound," in line 541, it is proposed to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That plate or sheet or taggers' iron or steel, by whatever name designated, other than the polished, planished, or glanced herein provided for, which has been pickled or cleaned by acid, or by any other material or process, or which is cold-rolled, shall pay one-quarter of one cent per pound more duty than the corresponding gauges of common or black sheet or taggers' iron or steel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON's name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who was called out on business a few moments ago. If present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HISCOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BATE. The junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is necessarily absent for a few moments. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bate,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Vance,
Berry,	Gorman,	Reagan,	Vest,
Blackburn,	Gray,	Saulsbury,	Walthall,
Coke,	Harris,	Turpie,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—18.

Cullom,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Stockbridge.
Davis,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Manderson,	Sherman,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Frye,	Morrill,	Stewart,

ABSENT—42.

Aldrich,	Chandler,	Hampton,	Platt,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Hearst,	Plumb,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Hiscock,	Pugh,
Blair,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Quay,
Blodgett,	Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Stanford,
Call,	George,	Paddock,	Voorhees.
Cameron,	Gibson,	Pasco,
Chace,	Hale,	Payne,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote discloses the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Spooner,
Bate,	Dolph,	McPherson,	Stewart,
Berry,	Eustis,	Manderson,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	Mitchell,	Turpie,
Call,	Frye,	Morrill,	Vance,
Chace,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Vest,
Chandler,	Gray,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Cockrell,	Hale,	Payne,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Reagan,
Davis,	Hiscock,	Sherman,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from North Carolina has had a yea-and-nay vote upon this, and it discloses a majority against his amendment. If he will allow his amendment to pass in the negative, I will then yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who wishes to make a motion.

Mr. VANCE. Very well.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is lost. Let the question be put on the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question might be put again by the sound, a quorum being present now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question may be taken by sound, the roll-call having disclosed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from North Carolina can get unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment to accomplish the object desired by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VANCE. I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let it stand. The point is to make progress with the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to get this paragraph out of the way. The Senator can withdraw his call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VANCE. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The amendment was rejected.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 17, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate December 13, 1888.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Perry Belmont, of New York, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

Post chaplain.

William Joseph Larkin, of Illinois, to be post chaplain in the Army of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 13, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ANNEXATION OF CANADA.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 240) authorizing the President of the United States to negotiate with reference to the unity and assimilation with the United States of the Dominion of Canada, or one or more of the provinces thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTRIC-LIGHT PLANT, MARINE HOSPITAL, NEW ORLEANS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation for the establishment of an electric-light plant at the United States marine hospital, New Orleans, La.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHTING THE STATUE OF LIBERTY, NEW YORK HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board of an additional appropriation for lighting the Statue of Liberty, New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REGISTER OF DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of State of an appropriation for the purchase of the Historical Register of the Diplomatic and Consular Service, prepared by George Bartle; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION FOR PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Librarian of Congress of an appropriation for the service of the Library for the fiscal year 1890; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO AT LOUISVILLE, KY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a letter from the Chief of Engineers, with accompanying papers, respecting the proposed bridge over the Ohio River between Louisville, Ky., and Jeffersonville, Ind.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PURCHASE OF MILITARY SITES, MAUMEE VALLEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report, submitted by the Chief of Engineers, on the results of examination of historic ground, location, and military works in the Maumee Valley, with an estimate of their probable cost if purchased by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, transmitting his annual report for the year ending December 3, 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH SMITH, ADMINISTRATRIX, VS. UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact by that court in the case of Elizabeth Smith, administratrix of John Putnam, deceased, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the president of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, transmitting his report for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Should not that go to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Committee on Appropriations makes provision for the home.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But this is an estimate, I understand.

The SPEAKER. It is not an estimate, but a statement as to the condition of the soldiers' homes.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting opinions of law and fact by the court in certain spoliation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GROSVENOR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOUGHERTY, until January 3 next, on account of important business.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT TUNNEL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the existence and powers of the joint select committee in respect to the Washington Aqueduct tunnel and the water supply of Washington, created by the concurrent resolution of the two Houses passed October 8, 1888, be continued during the present session of Congress to such time after January 1, 1889, as shall be necessary, in the judgment of said committee, for the complete execution of its duties.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the resolution?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The object is to extend the time within which the joint select committee for the investigation of the aqueduct tunnel may report. It will be remembered that it was limited to January 1, and this resolution extends the time as long as may be necessary beyond that date during the present session.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced as managers on the part of the House on the conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture, Mr. HATCH, Mr. WHITING of Michigan, and Mr. FUNSTON.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ENLOE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 2254) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ella M. Grover;

A bill (H. R. 5080) for the relief of C. B. Wilson; and

A bill (H. R. 11764) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I withdraw it for the present.

RESIGNATION OF CHAIRMANSHIPS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McCREARY. At the commencement of the first session of the Fiftieth Congress I was appointed chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and was also second on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Belmont has recently resigned as a member of the House of Representatives, which makes me chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I therefore resign the position of chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to resign his place on the Committee on Private Land Claims?

Mr. McCREARY. I resign the chairmanship of the Committee on Private Land Claims, but I desire to retain my place as a member of that committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resignation of the gentleman from Kentucky as chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims will be accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Under the rules governing such cases the chairmanship would devolve upon myself, inasmuch as I am second upon the Committee on Private Land Claims; but I am also chairman of the Committee on Patents and can not act in the capacity of chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and therefore I resign the chairmanship of that committee, but wish to retain my place on the committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resignation of the gentleman from Iowa will be accepted, and the Chair will appoint as chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims the next member in order, being the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER].

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution simply for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, the 8th day of January, 1889, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill 405, not to interfere with the consideration of revenue and general appropriation bills, and that this shall be a continuing order until such bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the title of the bill will be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is introduced for reference to the Committee on Rules. The resolution will be so referred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

OATHS OF NOTARIES PUBLIC.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 622) to amend section 2805 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow oaths to be administered by notaries public; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COURT AT QUINCY, ILL.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11638) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for a term of court at Quincy, Ill.," approved August 8, 1888; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TO EQUALIZE THE PAYMENT OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 11282) to equalize the payment and do justice to the officers, soldiers, and sailors of the United States in the late rebellion, who were paid in currency commonly called greenbacks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is a subject that has already been referred to the Committee on War Claims, and the Committee on Military Affairs report the bill back so that the Committee on Military Affairs may be discharged from its further consideration.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOUK. That is a House bill which went to the Senate and came back with an amendment. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on War Claims. I have conferred as to the bill with the chairman of the committee, but I see that he is not present, and I desire to concur in the Senate amendment, which lessens the term of service for those who seek relief. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "September 18" and insert "July 1."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to concurrence in the Senate amendment? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BONDS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back unfavorably the bill (H. R. 8873) in relation to bonds of disbursing or other officers and to monthly payments of the Army, and asked for non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, September 3, 1888.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Committee on Military Affairs report the bill back with the recommendation to non-concur in said amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state this is an irregular proceeding, but if there be no objection the Chair will entertain the request of the gentleman.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

Strike out lines 1 to 6, inclusive, and insert:

"That for the faithful discharge of the duties of any disbursing officer or other officer of the Army the Secretary of War may accept as surety or sureties on the bond of such officer an incorporated guaranty company, and may accept such individuals, or both, and such bond would be in lieu of former bonds of such officer, except to liabilities accruing subsequent to the date of approval of said bond."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the portion to be stricken out be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that it was wholly irregular during the call of committees for reports to consider the report.

Mr. PAYSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope my colleague [Mr. PAYSON] will not be less courteous than I have been to him.

Mr. PAYSON. I object to this bill on principle. I object to having incorporated bodies upon any bonds. That is the ground upon which I make my objection.

J. P. FOLEY.

Mr. GEAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a substitute (H. R. 11781) for the bill (H. R. 9482) for relief of the legal representatives of J. P. Foley, deceased, late a captain in the United States Army and assistant adjutant-general of United States volunteers; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GENERAL FRÉMONT.

Mr. SPINOLA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARET DURAND.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11295) granting a pension to Margaret Durand, hospital nurse; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM DOWNEY.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11412) granting a pension to William Downey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHRISTIAN MANUAL.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11369) granting a pension to Christian Manual; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. LLOYD.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7566) granting a pension to George W. Lloyd; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MATILDA WEED.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9323) granting a pension to Matilda Weed; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANNIE MAY PIFER.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 765) granting a pension to Annie May Pifer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 9158) to increase the pension of James Rush, of Company K, Fifteenth Illinois Infantry;

A bill (H. R. 11004) granting a pension to Sarah A. Tryon;

A bill (H. R. 11265) granting a pension to James H. Worthin; and

A bill (H. R. 10863) granting a pension to George Weggeman.

MARY JANE HARRIS.

Mr. FRENCH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6755) granting a pension to Mary Jane Harris; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADALINE A. SMYTH.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (S. 2765) granting a pension to Adaline A. Smyth; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH H. HARWOOD.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3114) granting a pension to Joseph Harwood; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3456) granting a pension to David O. Sanborn; and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 10983) increasing the pension of John Akers;

A bill (H. R. 11095) granting a pension to James D. Foster; and

A bill (H. R. 10227) granting a pension to Joseph H. Heiser.

JAMES METCALF.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 11311) granting a pension to James Metcalf; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARIA BRASTED.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably a bill (H. R 6598) granting a pension to Maria Brasted; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (S. 3467) to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases from one State to another, and for the punishment of certain offenses; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OATHS IN PENSION CASES, ETC.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (S. 1596) in relation to oaths in pension and other cases; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC PROPERTY.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back adversely the bill (S. 539) amending section 3749 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the disposition of property of the United States, and repealing the first paragraph of section 3208 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. On behalf of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, I ask that House bill No. 8184, known as the Pacific Railroad funding bill, be reprinted, with the accompanying report, for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PEEL addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at thirty-three minutes after 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs, which had consumed one hour, and at the expiration of that time had a measure under consideration; it is therefore, under the rules, entitled to another hour or so much of an hour as may be required to conclude that bill. By unanimous consent of the House this remaining hour belonging to the committee was passed over; and the gentleman from Arkansas now claims it on behalf of the committee.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent that as the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was called at a time when I was necessarily absent from the House, the committee be allowed their hour, not to interfere with the hour now to be occupied by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] asks unanimous consent that the Chair shall return in this call to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that the committee, after the Committee on Indian Affairs shall have occupied its time, shall be allowed its privilege under the rule providing this hour for the consideration of bills.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be reached before a great while under the regular call.

Mr. DIBBLE. Our committee was called just at the close of the session, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not object to this request. It is a privilege which has always been granted to other committees under like circumstances.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman is in error in stating that this privilege has always been granted under similar circumstances; it has been refused in a number of cases. I do not wish to be placed in the position of objecting in this particular case to a privilege ordinarily granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] objects to the request.

Mr. McMILLIN. We appropriated, I believe, $9,000,000 for public buildings at the last session; and I do not think there is any necessity for expediting this class of business.

CLAIMS OF WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. The hour begins at thirty-five minutes past 12 o'clock. The only privilege to which the Committee on Indian Affairs is now entitled under the rule is to complete the consideration of the bill which was before the House when the hour of the committee expired. The bill which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL] has sent to the desk is a private bill, and can not at any rate be considered during this hour.

Mr. PEEL. It is the bill which was under consideration, although it may be of a private character.

The SPEAKER. House bill 1407, to authorize the Court of Claims to hear and determine and render final judgment upon the claims of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the 9th of October last, and is still there.

Mr. PEEL. The point as to this being a private bill was waived, because we entered upon the consideration of it, and the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the House entered upon the consideration of the bill, its consideration will be continued; but under the rule it could only be taken up in this hour by unanimous consent.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, members may not be familiar with the terms of this bill——

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman will have to make the proper motion in order to reach it.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that the bill be read; it is not very long.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1407) to authorize Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment upon the claim of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians.

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of that part of the Cherokee Indians known as the Old Settlers or Western Cherokees against the United States, which claim was set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior to Congress of February 3, 1883 (said report being made under act of Congress of August 7, 1882), and contained in Executive Document No. 60 of the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, be, and the same hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court to try said cause, and to determine what sum or sums of money, if any, are justly due from the United States to said Indians, arising from or growing out of treaty stipulations and acts of Congress relating thereto, after deducting all payments heretofore actually made to said Indians by the United States, either in money or property; and to try and determine all questions that may arise in such cause on behalf of either party thereto and render final judgment thereon; and the Attorney-General is hereby directed to appear in behalf of the Government; and if said court shall decide against the United States the Attorney-General shall, within thirty days from the rendition of judgment, appeal the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States; and from any judgment that may be rendered the said Indians may also appeal to said Supreme Court: Provided, That the appeal of said Indians shall be taken within sixty days after the rendition of said judgment, and said courts shall give such cause precedence: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be accepted or construed as a confession that the Government of the United States is indebted to said Indians.

SEC. 2. That said action shall be commenced by a petition stating the facts on which said Indians claim to recover, and the amount of their claim; and said petition may be verified by the authorized agent or attorney of said Indians as to the existence of such facts, and no other statement need be contained in said petition or verification.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was read, as follows:

After the word "property," in line 18 of section 1, insert the following:

"And after deducting all offsets, counter-claims, and deductions of any and every kind and character which should be allowed to the United States under any valid provision or provisions in said treaties and laws contained, or to which the United States may be otherwise entitled, and after fully considering and determining whether or not the said Indians have heretofore adjusted and settled their said claim with the United States, it being the intention of this act to allow the said Court of Claims unrestricted latitude in adjusting and determining the said claim, so that the rights, legal and equitable, both of the United States and of said Indians may be fully considered and determined."

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed from the reading of this bill that its object is to refer the subject-matter in dispute between this branch of the Cherokee Indians and the United States to the Court of Claims, with the right to investigate all matters, either legal or equitable, growing out of the differences, and with the right of either party to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is made mandatory upon the Attorney-General of the United States to appeal should judgment be found against the Government.

The bill looks to a final settlement of this claim. It is impossible for any other tribunal to determine this question satisfactorily to either party, from the fact that the question turns entirely upon the construction of the treaties. It is strictly a legal question. The facts are simple, and in regard to them there is very little disagreement between the parties. The whole question turns upon the construction of the treaties and the acts of Congress relating thereto.

Therefore it is absolutely necessary that the court of last resort, the judicial tribunal of the country, should pass on this question and put it at rest one way or the other.

This claim has been thoroughly investigated by the Interior Department. It has been investigated by a special accountant authorized by resolution, who brings the Government into debt to these Indians in a large sum. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Price, also made investigation and agreed with this special accountant. I have investigated it myself and disagree with them in regard to the construction of the law governing this case. Therefore I have always been in favor, and so said at the time I made my report, of the bill proposing to pay the money directly to these parties. I was in favor of its going to the courts, as the only proper place where this matter could be determined.

Under the Bowman act the Senate referred this case to the Court of Claims. Under that act that court could do nothing but find the facts. Their finding under one construction of the treaty was that $400,000 would be due to these Indians, and under a different construction only the sum of $4,000. Under either construction of the treaty as reported by the Court of Claims there would be something due to these Indians. The court did not have the power to determine as to the construction of the law, and consequently could not settle this matter.

There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, in the bill except a provision for the reference of this case to the courts to determine the question which relates, as I have already stated, to the construction of law. If we owe these people anything we are, as a matter of course, in favor of paying it to them. If, however, we do not owe them anything the Government is entitled to know it.

Under the proposition of the Senate whatever is due to these Indians, whatever may be found due is drawing 5 per cent. interest every day it is allowed to remain unpaid. Therefore the sooner we know what is due and it is paid the sooner the matter will be settled, and the better it will be both for the Indians and the Government.

With this short statement, I will not longer detain the House, but if any gentleman wishes to ask me a question I will answer it to the best of my ability.

Mr. KILGORE. What amount is involved in this bill?

Mr. PEEL. That will depend on what construction the court gives the treaty. The Court of Claims reports under the Bowman act under one construction the Indians would be entitled to $400,000, while under another they would be entitled to only $4,000.

Mr. KILGORE. What amount is claimed by the Indians?

Mr. PEEL. They claim $400,000.

Mr. KILGORE. When did this accrue?

Mr. PEEL. Under the treaty of 1846. It is a question which arises under the treaty of 1835, which was adjusted in the treaty of 1846; that is, the items in dispute in regard to the transportation and subsistence of these Indians were put aside as stipulated in the treaty of 1842. It has been in the Departments and before Congress all the time.

Mr. KILGORE. Does this give the right of appeal to the Supreme Court?

Mr. PEEL. It makes it mandatory upon the Attorney-General to appeal if the case goes against the Government. It at the same time gives discretion to the Indians to appeal if they so wish. The bill is prepared with care. It is provided, on the part of the Attorney-General, every defense legal or equitable on the part of the Government shall be set up.

If there is no other gentleman desirous to speak on this question I will demand the previous question.

Mr. PERKINS. I would suggest to the chairman an amendment giving to the Attorney-General the same time in which to appeal as is given to the Indians.

Mr. PEEL. Thirty days are enough.

Mr. PERKINS. Sixty days are given to the Indians.

Mr. PEEL. Thirty days, I think, is sufficient time for the Attorney-General, but if the gentleman does not think that is enough, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question to allow him to offer his amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. I move, on page 3, line 1, to insert "sixty" in place of "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the amendment of the committee to insert as follows:

And after deducting all offsets, counter-claims, and deductions of any and every kind and character which should be allowed to the United States under any valid provision or provisions in said treaties and laws contained, or to which the United States may be otherwise entitled, and after fully considering and determining whether or not the said Indians have heretofore adjusted and settled their said claim with the United States, it being the intention of this act to allow the said Court of Claims unrestricted latitude in adjusting and determining the said claim, so that the rights, legal and equitable, both of the United States and of said Indians, may be fully considered and determined.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PEEL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITIA, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Committee on the Militia was called.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Speaker, I desire on behalf of the Committee on the Militia to call up for present consideration the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OATES in the chair). The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 657) to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed the 3d day of March, 1803.

Mr. MCADOO. After a short statement I will ask unanimous consent to forego the first formal reading of this bill.

When the Committee on the Militia was last called in the morning hour during the past summer we brought forward a House bill exactly similar to this—that is to say, that after the House bill had been read and discussed and amended up to the last hour and just preceding a vote on its final passage, the hour expired, and I was unable, therefore, to bring the House to a vote upon it.

The Senate bill that I now send to the desk is the House bill as it stood at the close of the discussion, to wit, with the various amendments made by the House to it. I would ask, therefore, that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that we proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BLOUNT. That ought not to be done.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think the House ought to pass any bill without having it read.

Mr. MCADOO. But this bill has been read. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], who objected when the House bill was up for consideration, I see is now in his place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill sent to the desk by the gentleman from New Jersey is not the same bill as that heretofore read in the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. This bill has never been read.

Mr. MCADOO. This bill comes from the Senate Calendar, and is a bill relating to the militia, being in all respects identical with the House bill to which I have referred as amended by the House.

The House bill failed of its passage through the House because of the expiration of the hour. I can not bring that bill up, I believe, in this hour; but this bill is the same exactly as the House bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this a Senate bill?

Mr. MCADOO. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has it been referred?

Mr. MCADOO. I understand so.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know as a matter of fact if it has been.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not informed as to that.

Mr. MCADOO. I suppose the Journal Clerk has a record of the fact. I can not myself speak with any certainty in regard to it. The printed copy, with the reference memoranda, is now in the Clerk's hands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that this bill has been referred, but not reported.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I submit that it is not in order to be called up now. It is not in the power of the committee to bring it up for consideration, as it is not in the House at all. The House has directed the committee to consider it, and they have not done so.

Mr. MCADOO. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia is good. The bill has not been reported and is not on the Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand now that this bill has not even passed the Senate, although that which has been sent to the desk seems to be a Senate bill. However, I will not make any further issue upon that point.

Mr. MCADOO. I acted entirely in calling up this Senate bill upon information furnished to me by the friends of the measure, who were intelligent gentlemen, and brought me a copy of the bill stating that it had passed the Senate; and my recollection is that the bill was referred to the Committee on Militia and reported back. I proceeded upon that assumption. There is probably some mistake as to whether the bill sent up is the one which passed the Senate, as, coming in just as the committee was called, I was obliged to act hastily.

However, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCADOO. When the Committee on the Militia was reached during the last session, I called up, as I have stated, a House bill which had been reported by the committee in reference to the organization of the militia in the District of Columbia. It was read through in the two hours and fully discussed, and various amendments were adopted, but the last hour to which the committee was entitled expired when we had reached the last lines of the bill, and before a final vote was taken on its passage. I wish to ask if I am entitled to call that bill up now; and, if so, I shall do so.

Mr. BLOUNT. In reference to that, Mr. Speaker, permit me to suggest that I do not think it will be admissible. That bill has had its two hours, and under the rules of the House has gone to the Calendar of unfinished business. The gentleman therefore can not reach it in that way, if at all in this hour. It has had all the time to which it is entitled under the rule.

Mr. MCADOO. But I think we can get out of the difficulty, if the gentleman will allow me, by asking unanimous consent in the Committee of the Whole to go to the Calendar of unfinished business and take up in the House to-day in the hour to which the committee is entitled that bill. This will save time and avoid a discussion of the rule, which may consume the hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think, Mr. Speaker, there are other bills equally important, and I do not see why we should make a special exception in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule reads that each committee, when it is called, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day, on either the House or the Union Calendar. The Chair is of opinion that the fact that this has been considered under that rule heretofore would not preclude its being called up again because it resumes its place on the Calendar.

Mr. BLOUNT. But, as the rule says, on the Calendar of unfinished business, if the Chair will examine further.

Mr. MCADOO. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will not make that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair, I presume, has not finally disposed of this matter, and I would like to have the rule to which reference is made read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule provides that such business, if not concluded in the two hours allotted to each committee, goes on the Calendar as unfinished business, to be taken up in its order.

Mr. BLOUNT. And its order is when the Calendar of unfinished business is reached. We do not reach it in this hour for the consideration of any such bills, and I challenge information, Mr. Speaker, on the subject. I have never known such a practice in the House, and I know that the contrary idea has prevailed. I have never seen the Calendar of unfinished business reached yet except by a motion and at the proper time; and it would certainly be a novel course for the House to assume now, if I am correct in believing that heretofore this practice has not prevailed.

Mr. MCADOO. I now move, the Speaker having ruled, that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering unfinished business on the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of unfinished business on the Calendar.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask to take from the Calendar of unfinished business the bill (H. R. 4961) to amend an act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed March 3, 1803.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MCADOO. I wish to make a short statement. When the Committee on the Militia was last reached, this bill was considered and read to about the last line of it——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The desire of the gentleman from New Jersey is to pass the Senate bill, which he claims to be exempt from the criticisms made to this bill.

Mr. MCADOO. Yes, sir. That is right.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will get unanimous consent to take that bill up.

Mr. MCADOO. Well, I ask unanimous consent to take up the Senate bill, which contains the House amendments. After the bill was considered in the House the Senate passed a bill embodying the amendments of the House, so that the Senate bill is the House bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair is informed, the bill the gentleman refers to has not passed the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. The real object was to take that up and offer it as a substitute to the other.

Mr. MCADOO. You can do that. The gentleman might offer it as a substitute if he thinks fit. I think we can get along all right. The House bill has now been amended, and the objectionable features about jury duty and other things eliminated, and the bill as passed includes the amendments that the gentleman desired.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before it goes further, I wish to inquire if this bill has not already been considered in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MCADOO. Two mornings.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then it is or may be a circumstance against the bill, when it has had two hours' consideration, that it can not go through. When a bill can not go through in two hours, generally there is some objection to it. I do not remember the provisions of the bill, and therefore I would ask that the bill be read, subject to the right to make objections.

Mr. BLOUNT. It has been read. If the gentleman will allow me I wish to state what perhaps has not occurred to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the bill has already been read. It has been read and considered by paragraphs and nearly concluded in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand.

Mr. ROGERS. There is no definite statement, then, by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO], or by any one who has charge of the bill, that the Senate bill is an exact fac-simile of the House bill as amended; and therefore I think before we adopt the Senate bill we ought to have it read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think, in fairness to the gentleman from New Jersey, it should be said that the gentleman claims the bill as amended by the House is about the same as the Senate bill.

Mr. McADOO. It is the same.

Mr. BLOUNT. If so, the gentleman may send this bill to the Senate rather than have it defeated by taking up time with the Senate bill. I do not want the gentleman to waste his time.

Mr. McADOO. I think I had better make a statement. My recollection is that the House bill was nearly concluded or that it had only two or three lines to be read when it was before the Committee of the Whole. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think there is a misunderstanding all around. I will endeavor to clear it up. The bill which is now before the House is a bill which the House considered for two successive morning hours. During those two morning hours the bill was fully discussed. The gentleman from Georgia led the opposition to the bill. The bill was read line after line and paragraph after paragraph, and amendments were offered and adopted. At the last morning hour to which the committee was entitled the bill had not been finally acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Up to the last section, as the Chair is informed by the Clerk.

Mr. McADOO. Yes, sir. Now, I make the point that all that is necessary is to have the reading of the bill finished. I claim that I am entitled to have the reading continued until the bill is finished and reported back to the House, whether favorably or unfavorably. Before that is done, however, I will make a brief statement about the bill, to refresh the memory of gentlemen as to its contents.

Mr. McMILLIN. If my friend will yield to me a moment, I wish to make the parliamentary point (so that we may have every advantage in case this question can not be amicably settled) that there is no rule under which this bill can be considered now, it having already had two hours' consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McADOO. That question has been settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that the Speaker has just passed upon that point and decided it adversely to the view presented by the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. I was not aware that there had been a ruling upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct as to a former ruling, but the Speaker has advised the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. OATES] to the effect that this bill is in order under this call.

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not know that there had been any ruling at all upon it, and therefore I made the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment which the committee propose, the last section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"SEC. 66. That the act 'more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1803, is hereby repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McADOO. This bill simply does for the militia of the District of Columbia what the States are doing for their own militia. The militia laws of the United States have not been amended or changed since 1803 up to a year ago. The original militia law, when this country was sparsely populated, was that every man who had reached the age of twenty-one years was a part of the militia; but as population increased it became necessary to select a body from the mass of citizens who should constitute the armed, equipped, and disciplined militia. The militia laws of the District of Columbia have remained substantially unamended for nearly a hundred years, and this bill, as I have already said, simply allows Congress to do for the already organized militia of this District that which the States do for their militia. In this connection I think it will be well to have read the report which accompanies the bill.

The report (by Mr. McADOO) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Militia, to whom was referred for consideration House bill 4961, to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

All measures relating to the militia are important. The militia are the popular and constitutional military defenders of the Republic. The founders of the Republic, jealous of a large standing army made special constitutional provision for the militia. The citizen soldiery of the country have ever been on the side of liberty, and while defending just laws, preserving peace, and defending against foreign invasion, have never been the instruments of tyrants, nor the destroyers of free States. This bill places the militia of the District of Columbia on the same footing as those of the several States.

The existing militia law for the District of Columbia was enacted in 1803. When that law was enacted the enrolled militia, which included every citizen between eighteen and forty-five years of age, was the essential and recognized military reserve of the country, and the law for the District of Columbia, like the laws of all the States, was framed with a view to instructing and utilizing it. As the population of the country increased, the necessity of requiring active duty from the whole body of the enrolled militia decreased, and became well-nigh impracticable, and the States successively repealed the old militia laws and substituted laws recognizing and providing for volunteer militia. In the District of Columbia the old law still remains in existence, though its provisions have been utterly disregarded for many years and the law has become not only obsolete but impracticable.

It being an axiom, recognized in the Constitution of our country, that a well regulated militia is necessary to the security of a republic, it would seem proper that at the capital of the Republic the militia should be made a model organization, and that the necessary legislation should be enacted to repeal these obsolete laws. The fact that the militia of the District of Columbia might be, in case of need, a protection for the enormous amount of public property accumulated here, and in any and every crisis the first defenders of the capital, make it proper and desirable that the Government should extend to the militia of the District the same aid and encouragement that is extended by the States to their local organizations.

Although the proposed bill is long and apparently elaborate, it contains only the usual and necessary provisions that are included in the militia codes of nearly all the States. The bill carries with it no appropriation of money. Expenditures, other than issues from the regular stores of the Army, it is provided shall be estimated for in the annual estimate of appropriations for the District of Columbia, and thereby will be at all times within the control of Congress.

The bill has been examined and approved by the War Department, is urged by the existing militia organizations of the District, and the committee report back the bill with amendments, striking out section 63, adding a section to repeal the old law, and amending the title, and recommend that the bill as thus amended do pass.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask my colleague a question or two. Wherein does this bill differ from the law under which the militia of this District is at present organized?

Mr. McADOO. At present the militia is organized under the old adult militia law. The militia of this District at present is largely constituted of independent military companies who have simply organized themselves, and who pay their own expenses to a great degree.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not that system working very well, and, under the existing organization, is there not a force large enough for all present purposes? I saw them parade on Thanksgiving Day, and it seemed to me that the display was a very creditable one and that the force was probably large enough to put down any incipient rebellion. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. I do not myself apprehend any great disturbance here, and my colleague is a peaceful man I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly; and therefore I am opposed to all this brass-mounted business.

Mr. McADOO. I know that my colleague is of course opposed to everything that is wrong. The display on Thanksgiving Day was the result of the efforts of one or two military gentlemen who organized it largely on their own responsibility, and if you do not do for the militia of the District what the States do for their militia, what our own State does for its militia, you will discourage such men. I am just as much opposed to unnecessary pomp, glitter, and display of military forces in time of peace, and to what my colleague calls the "brass-mounted business," as he is. The militia are citizens as well as soldiers, and eminently suited to our form of government. They do away with regular soldiers and furnish training to freemen to defend their rights and liberties, maintain the peace and dignity of the State, and repel invasion. A properly constructed militia is no menace to the people, but rather a safeguard. But our State, as the gentleman well knows, has expended very large sums of money for the maintenance of its militia.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will pardon me; we are legislating for the District of Columbia, not for the State of New Jersey.

Mr. McADOO. I am trying to induce the House to do for the District of Columbia what our State has done for it citizen soldiery—nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Do you not ask more for the District militia than is necessary?

Mr. McADOO. Not at all. This matter was fully discussed when the bill was up before. We are simply trying to do for the District militia what the States are doing or have done for their militia.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What additional amount of expenditure will be imposed on the people of this District under the operation of this proposed bill, and what additional expenditure will be required at the hands of the National Government to carry out this measure when this organization is perfected under the bill? I ask this question for information.

Mr. McADOO. So far as this bill is concerned, it will not take one cent out of the Treasury. The bill does not carry a penny of appropriation. It refers this whole matter to the District Committee. Our own State, as the gentleman well knows, has expended large sums of money for purposes of this kind; it has bought camp-grounds and provided armories through the local authorities.

I suppose that if the District Committees of the two Houses of Congress should see fit they might report an appropriation to provide an armory for the District militia. As to the additional expenditure there may be, it is impossible for me to state it exactly or even to give a rough estimate of the amount.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am in favor of a proper militia; but it seems to me this bill goes far beyond anything that is needed.

Mr. MCADOO. I repeat to my colleague, once for all, that this bill does not go as far as our own State has gone in this direction; and it does not contemplate the spending of so much money as we now expend on our militia.

There is in this city a large amount of public property which ought to be properly protected. We are not anticipating rebellion, or war, or revolution, or riot, or anything of that sort; we believe that our citizens are all peaceable; but it has been the policy of all States and communities to take necessary precautions for the protection of the public property; and this body of soldiery, composed of citizens of the District, might be available and very useful if any emergency should arise, which we all hope will not be the case.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]?

Mr. MCADOO. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is liable to objections which, if pointed out, my friend from New Jersey himself would, I think, admit to be reasonable. The bill, when under discussion heretofore, was read very nearly through before any amendments were offered. Criticisms were made upon different features of the bill; but they came too late. Now I find nothing in the record which relieves the bill from the criticism that horses are to be kept in the livery stables here at the Government expense for the use of these gentlemen of the militia on parade days, etc. Such a provision was in the bill, and I do not understand that it has been changed by amendment.

Mr. MCADOO. I have not the Journal before me, and can not recall to my memory all the amendments made to the bill. I only recollect that the gentleman from Georgia followed the reading very closely and offered, I think, quite a number of amendments, all of which, according to my recollection, I accepted. So that all the amendments which the gentleman proposed are, as I understand, a part of this measure and will have their place in the amended bill if it should be passed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I do not find that the record as kept by the Clerk is in accord with my friend's memory in reference to this matter. I did make some amendments——

Mr. MCADOO. If the gentleman will call attention to any part of the bill which he wishes to amend, I do not think there will be any objection. I shall be very glad to have him ask unanimous consent to go back and take the horses out of the livery stables and give them the freedom of the streets. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I think there are a good many comical things in this bill besides those that have been mentioned.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A gentleman connected with the Committee on Indian Affairs has suggested sotto voce that it would be well to provide that the horses be kept on the reservations.

Mr. MCADOO. My distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], who was the author of this bill, may remember something about the horse business.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to stir him up, because he is sensitive about this matter.

Mr. MCADOO. I trust my friend from Georgia will find the passages to which he objects. My time is not unlimited.

Mr. WEAVER. I object to the gentleman from Georgia being interfered with.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the committee at present?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing but the observations of the gentleman from New Jersey. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCADOO. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

Mr. WEAVER. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey is not in order while the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has not the floor except with the consent of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SPINOLA. Does this bill make any provision for the colored troops?

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out section 66, which proposes to repeal the act of March 3, 1803, providing for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia to the fact that that section has been passed.

Mr. BLOUNT. Such is not the record of the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 67, which was in the nature of an amendment reported by the committee, was read and adopted.

Mr. MCADOO. If I am entitled to the floor, I insist on my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. MCADOO. I insist on the motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it in order to have the amendments read which have been agreed to?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time.

Mr. BLOUNT. We would like to have the amendments read so we will know what we are voting on.

Mr. MCADOO. I ask for a division of the committee on the motion to rise and report the bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 2.

Mr. MCADOO. I demand tellers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. MCADOO and Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. MCADOO. Is it in order to withdraw the demand for tellers and also the point of no quorum, as the hour is nearly out, and ask that the bill and amendments be printed in the RECORD, so that it may go over until to-morrow, when we have another hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] made the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLOUNT, I withdraw it with the understanding stated by the gentleman from New Jersey.

There was no objection, and the bill and amendments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

They are as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4961) to amend the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed March 3, 1803.

Be it enacted, etc., That every able-bodied male citizen resident within the District of Columbia, of the age of eighteen years and under the age of forty-five years, excepting persons exempted by section 2, and idiots, lunatics, common drunkards, vagabonds, paupers, and persons convicted of any infamous crime, shall be enrolled in the militia. Persons so convicted after enrollment shall forthwith be disenrolled; and in all cases of doubt respecting the age of a person enrolled the burden of proof shall be upon him.

SEC. 2. That in addition to the persons exempted from enrollment in the militia by the general laws of the United States, the following persons shall also be exempted from enrollment in the militia of the District of Columbia, namely: Officers of the government of the District of Columbia; judges and officers of the courts of the District of Columbia; officers who have held commissions in the regular or volunteer Army or Navy of the United States; officers who have served for a period of five years in the militia of the District of Columbia or of any State of the United States; ministers of the gospel; practicing physicians; conductors and engine-drivers of railroad trains; members of the paid police and fire department.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall provide for the enrollment of the militia, and for this purpose may require the assessors of taxes, at the same time they are engaged in taking the assessment of valuation of real and personal property, to make a list of persons liable to enrollment; and such record shall be deemed a sufficient notification to all persons whose names are thus recorded that they have been enrolled in the militia. Immediately after the completion of each enrollment they shall furnish the commanding general of the militia with a copy of the same.

SEC. 4. That the enrolled militia shall not be subject to any duty except when called into the service of the United States, or to aid the civil authorities in the execution of the laws or suppression of riots.

SEC. 5. That whenever it shall be necessary to call out any portion of the enrolled militia the commander-in-chief shall order out, by draft or otherwise, or accept as volunteers, as many as required. Every member of the enrolled militia who volunteers, or who is ordered out or drafted under the provisions of this act, who does not appear at the time and place designated, may be arrested by order of the commanding general and be tried and punished by a court-martial. The portion of the enrolled militia ordered out or accepted shall be mustered into service for such period as may be required, and the commanding general may assign them to existing organizations of the active militia, or may organize them as the exigencies of the occasion may require.

SEC. 6. That the President of the United States shall be the commander-in-chief of the militia of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That there shall be appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States a commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia with the rank of brigadier-general, who shall hold office until his successor is appointed and qualified, but may be removed at any time by the President.

SEC. 8. That the staff of the militia of the District of Columbia shall be appointed and commissioned by the President and hold office until their successors are appointed and qualified, but may be removed at any time by the President. It shall consist of one adjutant-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, one inspector-general, one quartermaster-general, one commissary-general, one chief of ordnance, one chief engineer, one surgeon-general, one judge-advocate-general, and one inspector-general of rifle practice, each with the rank of major, and four aides-de-camp, each with the rank of captain. The commanding general may appoint a non-commissioned staff of the militia, to consist of one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one commissary-sergeant, one ordnance-sergeant, two staff-sergeants, one hospital steward, one color-sergeant, and one sergeant-bugler.

SEC. 9. That the President may assign an officer of the Army to act as adjutant-general of the militia of the District of Columbia, who while so assigned shall be commissioned as such and be subject to the orders of the commanding general and the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That the officer so assigned shall receive no other pay or emolument than that to which his rank in the Army entitles him when on detached service.

THE ACTIVE MILITIA—ITS ORGANIZATION.

SEC. 10. That the active militia shall be composed of volunteers, and shall be designated the National Guard of the District of Columbia; and in case the militia of the District of Columbia are called into the service of the United States, or required for the suppression of riots or to aid civil officers in the execution of the laws, shall be the first to be ordered into service.

SEC. 11. That in time of peace the National Guard shall consist of not more than thirty-six companies of infantry, which shall be arranged by the commanding general into such regiments, battalions, and unattached companies as he may deem expedient; one battery of light artillery, one troop of cavalry, one signal corps, one ambulance corps, one engineer corps, one band of music, and one corps of field musicians.

SEC. 12. That regiments of infantry shall consist of three battalions; and to each regiment there shall be one colonel and one lieutenant-colonel, and a staff to consist of one surgeon, one adjutant, one quartermaster, one inspector of rifle practice, and one chaplain, each with the rank of captain; and a non-commissioned staff, consisting of one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one commissary-sergeant, and one hospital steward.

SEC. 13. That battalions of infantry shall consist of four companies; and to each battalion there shall be one major; and a staff consisting of one surgeon, one adjutant, one quartermaster, and one inspector of rifle practice, each with the rank of first lieutenant; and a non-commissioned staff, consisting of one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, and one hospital steward.

SEC. 14. That to each company of infantry there shall be one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, four sergeants, one corporal to each ten privates, and not more than eighty-seven privates; and the minimum number of enlisted men shall be forty.

SEC. 15. That to the troop of cavalry there shall be one captain, one first lieutenant, one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, one quartermaster-sergeant, five sergeants, eight corporals, two trumpeters, and not more than eighty-three privates; and the minimum number of enlisted men shall be forty.

SEC. 16. That the battery of light artillery shall have not less than four nor more than six guns. To four guns there shall be one captain, two first lieutenants, one second lieutenant, one first sergeant, one quartermaster-sergeant, five sergeants, eight corporals, two buglers, and not more than eighty-two privates; and the minimum number of enlisted men shall be fifty-seven. To more than four guns there shall be, for each additional gun, one sergeant, two corporals, and not more than twenty nor less than ten privates; for two additional guns there shall be one additional second lieutenant.

SEC. 17. That to each signal corps, ambulance corps, and engineer corps there shall be one first lieutenant, two sergeants, two corporals, and not more than thirty-two nor less than fourteen privates.

SEC. 18. That the band of music shall consist of one chief musician, two sergeants, two corporals, and thirty-two privates; and the corps of field music of one principal musician, two sergeants, two corporals, and thirty-two privates. The chief musician, principal musician, and other non-commissioned officers of the band and field music shall be appointed by the commanding general.

SEC. 19. That when any company of the National Guard shall, for a period of not less than ninety days, contain less than the minimum number of enlisted men prescribed by this act, or, upon a duly ordered inspection, shall be found to have fallen below a proper standard of efficiency, the commanding general may either disband such company or consolidate it with any other company of the National Guard, and grant an honorable discharge to the supernumerary officers and non-commissioned officers produced by such consolidation. Officers and enlisted men discharged by reason of such disbanding or consolidation and at any time thereafter re-entering the service shall have allowed to them, as part of their term of service, the time already served.

ELECTION, APPOINTMENT, AND DISCHARGE OF COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

SEC. 20. That all officers shall be commissioned by the President of the United States. In time of peace, or when not in the service of the United States, they shall previously be elected or appointed as herein provided. No person commissioned as an officer shall assume such rank or enter upon the duties of the office to which he may be commissioned until he has accepted such commission and taken such oath or affirmation as may be prescribed.

Amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: Strike out, in section 20, the word "appointed," and insert in lieu thereof the word "nominated;" so it will read: "be elected or nominated as herein provided."

SEC. 21. That the staff officers of a regiment or battalion shall be appointed by the permanent commander thereof.

SEC. 22. That field officers of regiments or battalions shall be appointed by the commanding general. Captains and lieutenants of companies shall be elected by the written votes of the enlisted men of the respective companies.

Amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: Strike out, in sections 21 and 22, the word "appointed" in both cases where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "nominated."

SEC. 23. That elections of officers shall be ordered and held under such regulations as may be prescribed by the commanding general.

SEC. 24. That every person accepting an election or appointment as an officer shall appear before an examining board, to be appointed by the commanding general, which board shall examine said officer as to his military and other qualifications. If any officer shall fail to appear before the board of examination within thirty days after being notified, or shall fail to pass a satisfactory examination, the fact shall be certified by the board to the commanding general, who shall thereupon declare the election or appointment of such officer null and void. If in the opinion of the board such officer is competent, and otherwise qualified, they shall certify the fact to the commanding general, who shall thereupon recommend him to the President for commission.

Amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: In section 24, strike out the word "appointment" in both cases where it occurs and insert in lieu thereof the word "nomination."

SEC. 25. That a commissioned officer may be honorably discharged—

Upon tender of resignation;

Upon disbandment of the organization to which he belongs;

Upon report of a board of examination, or for failure to appear before such board when ordered.

He may be dismissed upon the sentence of a court-martial; conviction in a court of justice of an infamous offense.

THE APPOINTMENT AND REDUCTION OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

SEC. 26. That non-commissioned staff officers shall be appointed by the permanent commander of the organization to which they belong; and permanent commanders of battalions shall appoint the non-commissioned officers of companies, upon the written nomination of the respective captains; but they may withhold such appointment if, in their judgment, there be proper cause; non-commissioned officers of unattached companies shall be appointed by their respective captains. The permanent commander of any battalion or unattached company may reduce to the ranks any company non-commissioned officers of his command.

ENLISTMENT AND DISCHARGE OF SOLDIERS.

SEC. 27. Enlistment in the National Guard shall be for a term of three years: Provided, however, That any soldier who may have received an honorable discharge, by reason of the expiration of his term of service, may, within thirty days thereafter, re-enlist for a term of one, two, or three years, to date from the expiration of his previous term. All terms of service, except in case of re-enlistment, shall commence at noon on the day of enlistment, and expire at noon on the day of discharge.

SEC. 28. Every person enlisting in the National Guard shall sign an enlistment paper which shall contain an oath of allegiance to the United States. The requisites and regulations for enlistment and the form of enlistment paper and oath for enlisting men shall be prescribed by the commanding general.

SEC. 29. That no enlisted man shall be honorably discharged before the expiration of his term of service, except by order of the commanding general, and for the following reasons:

Upon his own application, approved by the commanding officer of his company and by superior commanders;

Upon removal from the District;

Upon disability, established by certificate of a medical officer;

To accept promotion by commission;

Whenever, in the opinion of the commanding general, the interest of the service demands such discharge.

SEC. 30. That enlisted men shall be dishonorably discharged by order of the commanding general:

To carry out the sentence of a court-martial;

Upon conviction of felony in a civil court;

Upon expulsion from his company in accordance with its by-laws or regulations;

Upon discovery of re-enlistment after previous dishonorable discharge.

SEC. 31. That every soldier discharged from the service of the District shall be furnished with a certificate of such discharge, which shall state clearly the reasons therefor. Dishonorable discharges will have the word "dishonorable" written or printed diagonally across their faces, in large characters, with red ink, and the re-enlistment clause will be erased by a line.

ARMS, UNIFORMS, AND EQUIPMENTS.

SEC. 32. That the uniforms, arms, and equipments of the National Guard shall be the same as prescribed and furnished to the Army of the United States. Every organization of the National Guard shall be provided with such ordnance and ordnance stores, clothing, camp and garrison equipage, quartermaster's stores, medical supplies, and other military stores, as may be necessary for the proper training and instruction of the force and for the proper performance of the duties required under this act. Such property shall be issued from the stores and supplies appropriated for the use of the Army, upon the approval and by the direction of the Secretary of War, to the commanding general, upon his requisitions for the same. The property so issued shall remain and continue to be the property of the United States and shall be accounted for by the commanding general at such times, in manner, and on such forms as the Secretary of War may require.

SEC. 33. That the commanding general may transfer all public property, received by him for the use of the National Guard under the provisions of this act, to the several departmental officers of the general staff, and may make and prescribe regulations for its issue by them, and for its care and preservation by the officers or soldiers to whom issued.

SEC. 34. That every officer receiving public property for military use shall be accountable for the articles so received by him, and shall make returns of such property at such times, in such manner, and on such forms as may be prescribed. He shall be liable to trial by court-martial for neglect of duty, and also to make good to the United States the value of all such property defaced, injured, destroyed, or lost, by any neglect or default on his part, to be recovered in an action of tort, or by any other action at law, to be instituted by the judge-advocate-general of the militia at the order of the commanding general. All money received on account of loss or damages shall be paid in the Treasury of the United States, and shall be accounted for by the commanding general in his returns to the Secretary of War.

SEC. 35. That any officer or soldier who shall sell, dispose of, pawn or pledge, willfully destroy or injure, or retain after proper demand made, any public property issued under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding two months, or by a fine not exceeding $100, or by both; and it is hereby made the duty of the judge of the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information filed or complaint made under oath, to issue process for the arrest of the offender, and to cause him to be brought before the police court to be dealt with according to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 36. That until an officer, or his legal representative, shall have received notice that the property accounts of such officer have been examined and found correct, the liability of such officer, or of his estate, for public property for which he is or may have been responsible shall be in no way affected by resignation, discharge, change in official position, or death. Upon the death or desertion of an officer responsible for public property his immediate commander shall at once cause the property for which such officer was responsible to be collected, and a correct inventory made by actual count and examination; which inventory shall be forwarded to the commanding general, in order that any deficiency may be made good from the estate of the deceased or deserting officer; compensation for such deficiency may be recovered in the manner provided in section 34.

SEC. 37. That property issued or provided under the provisions of this act which becomes unfit for use, and is condemned as unserviceable shall be reported by the commanding general to the Secretary of War, and shall be disposed of as may be directed by him.

SEC. 38. That any organization of the active militia may, with the approval of the commanding general, and at its own expense, adopt any other uniform than that issued to it; but such uniform shall not be worn when such organization is on duty under the orders of the commanding general except by his permission.

SEC. 39. That organizations of the National Guard shall have the right to own and keep personal property, which shall belong to and be under the control of the active members thereof; and the commanding officer of any organization may recover for its use any debts or effects belonging to it, or damages for injury to such property; action for such recovery to be brought, in the name of such commanding officer, before any justice of the peace, with the right of appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or before the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and no suit or complaint pending in his name shall be abated by his ceasing to be commanding officer of the organization; but, upon the motion of the commander succeeding him, such commander shall be admitted to prosecute the suit or complaint in like manner and with like effect as if it had been originally commenced by him.

SEC. 40. That the quartermaster-general of the militia shall provide, by rental or otherwise, such armories for the National Guard as may be allowed and directed by the commanding general. He shall also provide each organization with such lockers, closets, gun-racks, and cases or desks as may be necessary for the care, preservation, and safe-keeping of the arms, equipments, uniforms, records, and other military property in their possession. He shall also provide suitable rooms for the offices of the commanding general and staff, for the keeping of books, the transaction of business, and the instruction of officers, and also suitable places for the storage and safe-keeping of public property.

MILITARY DUTIES.

SEC. 41. That any drill, parade, encampment, or duty that is required, ordered or authorized to be performed under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed to be a military duty, and while on such duty every officer and enlisted man of the National Guard shall be subject to the lawful orders of his superior officers, and for any military offense may be put and kept under arrest or under guard for a time not extending beyond the term of service for which he is then ordered.

SEC. 42. That the commanding general shall prescribe such stated drills and parades as he may deem necessary for the instruction of the National Guard, and may order out any portion of the National Guard for such drills, inspections, parades, escort, or other duties, as he may deem proper. The commanding officer of any regiment, battalion, or company may also assemble his command, or any part thereof, in the evening for drill, instruction, or other business, as he may deem expedient; but no parade shall be performed by any regiment, battalion, company, or part thereof, without the permission of the commanding general.

SEC. 43. That an annual inspection and muster of each organization of the National Guard, and an inspection of their armories and of public property in their possession, shall be made at such times and places as the commanding general may order and direct.

SEC. 44. That the National Guard shall perform not less than six consecutive days of camp duty in each year, at such time as may be ordered by the commanding general; and the quartermaster-general of the militia, subject to the approval of the commanding general, shall provide, by rental or otherwise, a suitable camp ground for the annual encampment of the militia, make the necessary provisions thereon for the encampment, and provide necessary transportation to and from the same for baggage and supplies.

SEC. 45. The National Guard shall have the use of the drill grounds and rifle-range at the Washington Barracks, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and the commanding general of the militia shall provide such additional targets and accessories as may be necessary for the use of the militia.

SEC. 46. That when there is in the District of Columbia a tumult, riot, mob, or a body of men acting together by force with attempt to commit a felony or to offer violence to persons or property, or by force and violence to break and resist the laws, or when such tumult, riot, or mob is threatened, it shall be lawful for the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or for the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, to call on the commander-in-chief to aid them in suppressing such violence and enforcing the laws; the commander-in-chief shall thereupon order out so much and such portion of the militia as he may deem necessary to suppress the same, and no member thereof who shall be thus ordered out by proper authority for any such duty shall be liable to civil or criminal prosecution for any act done in the discharge of his military duty.

SEC. 47. That no officer or soldier of the National Guard, when ordered on duty to aid the civil authorities, or when ordered into the service of the United States, in obedience to the call or order of the President, shall be excused from such duty except upon the certificate of the surgeon of his command of physical disability, such certificate to be presented to the commanding general in case of an officer, or to his company commander in case of a soldier. If such officer or soldier fail to furnish such excuse he shall be tried and punished by a court-martial. For absence from any other military duty required or ordered under the provisions of this act the penalty shall be such as may be prescribed by the commanding general, or the by-laws of the organization to which the officer or soldier belongs.

SEC. 48. That United States forces or troops, or any portion of the militia, parading, or performing any duty according to law, shall have the right of way in any street or highway through which they may pass: Provided, That the carriage of the United States mails, the legitimate functions of the police, and the progress and operations of fire-engines and fire departments shall not be interfered with thereby.

SEC. 49. That every commanding officer, when on duty, may ascertain and fix necessary bounds and limits to his parade or encampment. Whoever intrudes within the limits of the parade or encampment after being forbidden, or whoever shall interrupt, molest, or obstruct any officer or soldier while on duty, may be put and kept under guard until the parade, encampment, or duty be concluded; and the commanding officer may turn over such person to any police officer, and said police officer is required to detain him in custody for examination or trial before the police court, and the judge thereof may punish such offense by a fine not exceeding $25.

SEC. 50. That all officers and employés of the United States and of the District of Columbia who are members of the National Guard shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties, without loss of pay or time, on all days of any parade or encampment ordered or authorized under the provisions of this act.

MILITARY COURTS.

SEC. 51. Courts of inquiry, to consist of not more than three officers, may be ordered by the commanding general, for the purpose of investigating the conduct of any officer, either at his own request or on a complaint or charge of conduct unbecoming an officer. Such court of inquiry shall report the evidence adduced, a statement of facts, and an opinion thereon, when required, to the commanding general, who may, in his discretion, thereupon order a court-martial for the trial of the officer whose conduct has been inquired into.

SEC. 52. That general courts-martial for the trial of commissioned officers or enlisted men shall be ordered by the commanding general at such times as the interests of the service may require, and shall consist of not less than five nor more than thirteen officers, and a judge-advocate, none of whom shall be of less rank than the accused, when it can be avoided.

SEC. 53. That for the trial of enlisted men for all minor offenses the commanding officer of each battalion and unattached company shall, at such times as may be necessary, appoint courts-martial. Such battalion and company courts-martial shall consist, for a battalion, of one officer whose rank is not below that of captain; and for a company, of a lieutenant. Such courts shall have power, subject to the approval of the officer ordering the court, to sentence to be reprimanded by said officer in battalion or company orders; or, in case of a company non-commissioned officer, to be reduced to the ranks, or to pay such fines as may be imposed and allowed by the regulations or by-laws of the organization to which the accused belongs; and such court may, with the approval of the commanding general, sentence to be reprimanded in general orders or to be dishonorably discharged.

SEC. 54. That the president of a general court-martial or court of inquiry, and the officer constituting a battalion or company court-martial, shall have power to administer the usual oath to witnesses, and may issue summonses for all witnesses whose attendance at such court may, in his opinion, be necessary, and any officer or soldier failing to serve such summons, and any witness failing to appear and testify when so summoned shall be liable to trial by court-martial.

SEC. 55. That in all courts-martial and courts of inquiry the arraignment of the accused, the proceedings, trial, and record shall in all respects conform as nearly as practicable to the regulations for the same in the Army of the United States.

EXPENSES AND ALLOWANCES.

SEC. 56. That there shall be allowed for the general expenses of the militia such sums as may be necessary for the rental and furnishing of offices for headquarters, stationery, postage, printing and issuing orders, advertising orders, providing necessary blanks for use of the militia, the cost of storing, caring for, and issuing all public property, and such other contingent expenses, not herein specially provided for, as may be estimated and appropriated for; the accounts for which shall be certified to by the officer receiving the service or property charged for, approved by the commanding general, and paid in the manner provided in section 60.

SEC. 57. That during the annual encampment, and on every duty or parade ordered by the commanding general, there shall be allowed and paid for each day of service: To each member of the regularly enlisted band, $4; to each member of the regularly enlisted corps of field music, $2; to the chief musician, $8, and to the principal musician $6. In event there is no enlisted band or field music, or not a sufficient number of either, the commanding general may authorize the employment of such as he may deem necessary for the occasion. The payments for bands of music and drum corps shall be made in the manner provided in section 60.

SEC. 58. That during the annual encampment, and on every duty or parade ordered by the commanding general, there may be employed such number of horses as the commanding general may authorize for the use of the battery of light artillery, the troop of cavalry, the ambulance corps, the signal corps, and the non-commissioned general staff, the cost of which shall be paid in the manner provided in section 60.

SEC. 59. That during the annual encampment, or when ordered on duty to aid the civil authorities, the National Guard shall be furnished with subsistence stores, of the kind, quality, and amount allowed and prescribed by the Army. Such stores shall be issued from the stores and supplies appropriated for the use of the Army, upon the approval and by the direction of the Secretary of War, to the commanding general upon his requisitions for the same.

SEC. 60. That the commanding general shall annually transmit to the commissioners of the District of Columbia an estimate of the amount of money required for the next ensuing fiscal year to pay the expenses authorized by this act, and the said commissioners shall include the same in their annual estimates of appropriations for the District; and all money appropriated to pay the expenses authorized by this act shall be disbursed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, upon vouchers duly certified and approved by the commanding general, and accounted for by them in the same manner as in all other moneys appropriated for the expenses of the District.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

SEC. 61. That companies, battalions, or regiments may adopt constitutional articles of agreement or by-laws, subject to the approval of the commander-in-chief, for the government of matters relating to the civic affairs of their respective organizations, the regulation of fines for non-performance of duty, and the determination of causes upon which excuses from fines may be based: Provided, however, That such articles or rules shall not be repugnant to law or the regulations for the government of the militia: And provided further, That the articles or rules adopted by any company or battalion shall not be repugnant to the articles or rules adopted for the general government of the regiment or battalion to which it belongs. Certified copies of such articles or rules, with like copies of all alterations, as finally approved by the commanding general, shall be deposited in the office of the adjutant-general.

SEC. 62. That no officer or soldier shall be liable to jury duty; and any officer or soldier who shall have served continuously and faithfully for nine years in the National Guard shall be exempt for life thereafter from jury duty.

SEC. 63. That each company of the National Guard shall be entitled to enroll not exceeding twenty honorary members, who, upon the payment into the treasury of such company of not less than $25 annually, shall be exempted from active military duty and jury duty, upon the exhibition of a receipt for such payment for one year from the date thereof.

Amendment of Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: Strike out sections 62 and 63.

SEC. 64. The departmental and military duties of the officers provided for in this act shall be correlative with those discharged by similarly designated officers in the Army of the United States.

SEC. 65. That the system of discipline and field exercise ordered to be observed by the Army of the United States, or such other system as may hereafter be directed for the militia by laws of the United States, shall be observed by the National Guard.

SEC. 66. That the commanding general, subject to the approval of the commander-in-chief, is authorized to make and publish regulations for the government of the militia in all matters not specifically provided for by law, conforming the same to the practice and regulations of the Army so far as they may be applicable.

SEC. 67. That it shall be a misdemeanor for any body of men, other than the regularly organized militia and the troops of the United States, except such independent military organizations as are now in existence, to associate themselves together as a military company or organization, or meet for drill with arms, or parade in public with arms, without the permission of the commanding general; and whoever belongs to or parades with any such unauthorized body of men with arms shall be punished by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by a fine not exceeding $50, or by both; and the police court of the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of misdemeanors under the provisions of this section.

Amendment of Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union: Strike out section 67; insert at the end of the bill as an additional section the following:

SEC. 67. That the act "more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1803, is hereby repealed.

Amend the title so as to read:

A bill to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour having expired, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4961) to amend the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed March 3, 1803, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the unfinished business in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the pending amendment to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in the sixth section of the bill, the words "in legal manner to the commission provided for in this act," in the second and third lines of said section, and insert:

"By the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, which shall be first obtained by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States; and when said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, has been obtained," etc.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the entire section be read as it will stand if amended.

The section as proposed to be amended was reported.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides for extending the provisions of the bill so as to require the consent of all of the five civilized tribes to any disposition of the lands, and of all the other tribes in the Territory, making it very indefinite and uncertain as to what it really requires. As the bill itself provides for getting the consent of the tribes having an interest in the lands, the only ones whose consent it is desired or necessary to obtain, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I want to know if this bill has been read in its entirety or not, from the first to the last?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this sitting of the committee.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not understand how it comes up in this way, and that we are to plunge into it in medias res in this manner.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this bill comes over as unfinished business from a preceding sitting of the committee. The sixth section of the bill having been reached, it is now being considered under the five-minute rule for debate and amendment. The pending amendment to the sixth section, which has just been read, is that offered by the gentleman from Mississippi himself.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed by the committee that the language of the sixth section of this bill provides for the approval or consent of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, which shall signify its assent to the provisions of the section, in the words of the bill, "in legal manner."

That phrase, as embodied in the bill, seems to me to be very indefinite and uncertain, and indeed in that regard it bears a very close relationship to the bill in its entirety, for all of these sections seem to be of a similar character.

I propose to strike out the words "in legal manner to the commission provided under this act," and insert:

By the consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, which shall be first obtained by a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, and when said commission shall have reported that said consent of said Cherokee tribe of Indians, or any other tribe or tribes having an interest therein, has been obtained.

Now, the proposition is that the consent of the Indians to the organization of this Territory over their lands shall be first obtained instead of leaving it as the bill proposes, to be subsequently obtained after the passage of the bill itself. The amendment provides that as a preliminary condition the Indians shall be consulted about the matter, as they are the parties in interest. According to the theory of the gentleman on the other side of the Chamber who advocates this bill [Mr. WARNER], and whom I do not now see in his seat, and the theory of the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, this whole matter is to proceed upon the idea that the Indians are to give their consent, and if they are to give their consent why should not that consent be obtained as a condition-precedent instead of being subsequently obtained? Every safeguard, I submit, should be thrown around the rights of the Indians if they are to be consulted; and if their consent is to be had it should be done as a preliminary condition to the organization of the Territory over their property. They are, Mr. Chairman, the owners of the soil; they are the parties most in interest; they are the persons whose consent must be obtained, and therefore I have moved the amendment as preferable to the very indefinite language of the bill which provides that their assent shall be obtained "in legal manner." There ought to be something definite and positive about how that assent shall be obtained; and as no subsequent provision of the bill covers it, because they are equally indefinite, it ought to be ascertained by a commission before any Territorial government is established or attempted to be established at all.

Now the authors of this measure at one time almost conceded the fact by an amendment which was proposed, I believe, by the gentleman from Missouri, to whom I have referred, and who is now in his seat, to organize this Territory out of the little strip of land called No Man's Land, and not embracing any other portion, for if I remember aright in the progress of the discussion at one period the proposition was made to confine the territorial limits of this somewhat anomalous territory to the strip called No Man's Land, and exclude from it any other portion of the country which the original bill as reported from the Committee on the Territories embraced. I think, therefore, in justice to the Indians themselves, as well as in justice to the phraseology of the bill, this should certainly be positive in its terms, and for that reason that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WARNER. I move to strike out the last word. As the gentleman from Mississippi has referred to me in the argument he has presented, I wish to be heard for a few moments.

The proposed amendment, it will be recollected by the members of the committee, is substantially the same that has been voted on at least two or three times in the progress of the discussion on this bill. Under the bill it is provided that if the Cherokees, who alone are interested in what is known as the Cherokee Outlet, shall give their consent to treat with the commission for the opening and sale of that Outlet, that it should not be in the power of a mere handful of Indians who are under the control of the cattle syndicates or of any other syndicates to obstruct the opening of that territory; and the same is true of that part of the territory that may belong to the Creeks or the Seminoles or the Choctaws, or any other tribe having an interest there.

The gentleman's amendment is simply this, that the consent of every tribe and every band of Indians in the Indian Territory must be had before any part of the Territory can be opened to actual settlement. It amounts, Mr. Chairman, to placing in the way of the opening of this Territory a stumbling-block, as I say, and enable a tribe that may be manipulated or controlled by gentlemen who desire to prevent the opening of this Territory to actual settlement. That, sir, is the amendment in substance.

Mr. HOOKER. If the gentleman from Missouri had examined a little more critically the amendment which I propose, he would have hardly made the argument which he has addressed to the committee, because it proposed to get legal assent alone from the Cherokees, who are the owners of the Cherokee Outlet, and not that also of other Indians to whom they may have transferred rights, and obtain the assent of other Indians who have an interest in the land which it embraces.

Now, if the Cherokees have settled any other tribe of Indians there, or in that country, and they have an interest in it, I think it is but proper that their assent should be obtained. If not, it is a simulated pretense that they desire to obtain the assent of the Indians. If the Cherokees have ceded the right to any other tribe or tribes, by which they have become the occupants of any part of this outlet, then it is proper that they should be consulted as well as the Cherokees themselves, who are the owners by the patent of the Cherokee Outlet.

Now, I heard a good deal about cattle syndicates. I do not know anything about cattle syndicates. I do not know who compose them. I have never had a communication or writing from any of them, and I do not know any of them. I am speaking in behalf of these Indians. If they choose to rent these lands to a syndicate, they have as much right to rent to them as the gentleman from Missouri has to rent his lands. They are the owners. It is a simulated pretense to give a patent to these lands when you do not intend to carry into effect the rights given in the patent. If they are the owners, possessors, and occupiers of this tract of land, and if they have given the right to locate upon it to any other friendly tribes more unfortunate or less powerful and wealthy than they, then are they not to be consulted as to the occupancy of the lands and the creation of this Territory?

I can see no reason why they should not. The gentleman states, as I understand his argument, that so far as the Cherokees are concerned, they ought to be consulted, and their assent ought to be obtained, not in the vague, indefinite, uncertain manner mentioned by that section of the bill, in "legal form," but by a preliminary commission appointed to ascertain whether or not they desire to have a Territory created within these lands. I can not, therefore——

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER. Does the amendment include obtaining the consent of other persons?

Mr. HOOKER. No, sir.

Mr. WEAVER. Only that of the Indians—other tribes.

Mr. HOOKER. Other tribes or persons. I do not recollect the phraseology. It is meant to be tribes. It is not intended to apply to anybody but the Indians; because I will say in answer to the gentleman from Iowa that if anybody has the right it is the Indians. It belongs to them.

Mr. WEAVER. I think the gentleman said that they had the right to lease these lands to the cattle-men.

Mr. HOOKER. They have, and have leased it; and I see in a paper——

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], as I understand, says that they have as much right to lease their land (speaking of the Cherokees with reference to the outlet) as the gentleman from Missouri has a right to lease his land. Does not the gentleman from Mississippi know that the Attorney-General of the United States has decided just to the contrary opinion? Does he not know that Attorney-General Devens decided just to the opposite opinion? Does he not know that Mr. Lamar, then Secretary of the Interior, issued an order just the opposite to the opinion that the gentleman has given, that they have no right to lease these lands, and that the parties occupying under the pretended lease are there only by the forbearance of the Government, and may be ordered off at any moment?

Mr. HOOKER. Are you through with your argument?

Mr. WARNER. Usually when I stop I am through.

Mr. HOOKER. Then I will answer if you will give me time to answer. If the Cherokee Indians own these lands by patent of the Government, then they own them by a title as good as the title which the gentleman derives to his own lands in Missouri, which came primarily through a patent of the Government from somebody. That proposition can not be doubted. I presume it has never been denied that they do own it since a patent was made to them. Then I care not what may have been decided upon this subject by the Attorney-General; they undoubtedly have the right to use and occupy it themselves according to the old legal maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." What they may do by another they may do by themselves.

I see in a paper which came to me yesterday or this morning that they have leased these lands in this Cherokee Outlet for the sum of $200,000 per annum—a very handsome sum for these Indians to get for these lands.

Now, if they own these lands and the lands are patented to them and they have the right of occupancy and do occupy them, then before you can have the face to ask that you shall take those lands and dedicate them to be a Territory of the United States for occupancy by white people, you at least ought to obtain the consent of these Indians as a preliminary condition; and that is what my amendment proposes with reference to these Indians, and also with reference to any others who may have acquired interests from them.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Missouri will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment be closed in ten minutes, allowing five minutes to each side.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I give notice that at the end of ten minutes I shall move that the committee rise to close debate.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, I should not say anything in reply to the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] if he had not, in his honesty, repeated that statement regarding the Cherokees owning this land so often that I am inclined to think he really believes it himself. He seems to have slept an absolute Rip Van Winkle sleep upon the history of the title to the Cherokee Strip. With all his pretended knowledge in behalf of these Indians, he seems not to know that they absolutely ceded this Cherokee Strip to the United States Government in 1866. He does not seem to know that in 1872, in exact accordance with an act of Congress to carry into effect that treaty, appraisers were appointed for this Cherokee Strip. He seems to have forgotten that in 1877 those appraisers made an appraisement of it. He does not seem to know that that appraisement was approved by President Hayes and the sum fixed by him to pay the Indians for that land. He does not seem to know that those Indians agreed to it; that they came here, by their attorneys and by their agents, and hung around the Halls of Congress during two or three Congresses and asked the Senate committee to ask the House committee to make the appropriation in accordance with the appraisement, as finally approved and fixed by President Hayes, and that in the argument which their agents and attorneys made they insisted that the Indians did not own the land; that they had no further right or title to it, and that Congress owed them the $3,000,000; and I believe they were correct.

I believe that Congress then did not do its full duty, but, in pursuance of the policy of trying to save something for the time being even at the risk of greater loss at the end, it was contended by some gentlemen that the Government did not owe this money on the land at that particular time, that they owed only a portion of it; so they appropriated a few hundred thousand dollars from time to time, leaving the balance due, and it is due to those Indians to-day, and the only excuse the Indians have for being upon that land at all is that they have an equitable claim, which this bill provides to have negotiated for. That is all the reason they have for asking more money to-day, because Congress did not pay them the three millions at that time. But Congress did not do its duty in paying for the land. It changed the policy of settling friendly Indians upon it by an act of Congress with which these Indians found no fault, because, after Congress had so changed its policy as to settling friendly Indians upon the land, these Indians were here asking Congress for their pay and repeating that under the cession they had no interest in the land. Now, sir, I hope it will not be repeated more than forty times more during this debate that these Indians own the fee-simple title to this land. I hope it will be understood that they themselves do not claim it, and that their agents do not claim it when they state honestly what they believe. But they have an equitable claim; they are entitled to something in addition to the three millions, because they were not paid the money that was due to them at the time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] has stated that there was an appraisal made of these lands, and that the Indians, by their agents, appeared here and demanded payment from the Government, and he seems to rely upon that circumstance at this time. Now, as the gentleman himself states, Congress refused at the time to take that view of the transaction and refused to make the payment——

Mr. SYMES. No, they did not.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And therefore are we not estopped from claiming now that that was a completed transaction?

Mr. SYMES. Not at all.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It takes two parties to make a bargain, and Congress declined to agree to the proposition.

Mr. SYMES. Not at all. The gentleman from Michigan is entirely mistaken as to the history of that matter. The payment was simply delayed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. How many years has it been delayed?

Mr. SYMES. It has been delayed only about one-tenth as long as Congress has delayed many other honest claims, and as a consequence of that delay an additional equitable claim has accrued.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It seems to me that if Congress had looked upon the matter as a completed transaction they would have made the payment at the time it was contemplated, and, having refused to do so, I think they are now estopped from claiming anything under that proposed transaction. It takes two to make a bargain, and that bargain was not completed.

Mr. SYMES. There were hundreds and thousands of dollars paid on this transaction, but there was a balance remaining unpaid, which was delayed from time to time, and one Commissioner of Indian Affairs specially recommended the payment of it, and other officers of the Government have specially recommended its payment. But all of it was not paid. The balance remains due, and that is why this equitable claim is still pending.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat familiar with the history of this question, having studied it to some extent; but it is some time since I looked over the papers. Had I known the question was coming up to-day I would have refreshed my recollection. But I want to observe that when the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] attacks the statements of the gentleman from Mississippi and says that gentleman seems not to know certain things, it occurs to me it would be well for the gentleman from Colorado to refresh his recollection and his knowledge about those facts.

In the first place, the gentleman from Colorado, referring to the treaty of 1866, says that there was an absolute cession of these lands by the Cherokee Indians. Article 16, of the treaty of 1866, does not provide for an absolute cession of this land. That article provides that these lands shall be agreed to be ceded, and that when occupied in a certain body and tract, on which friendly Indians may be located, the Cherokees are then to cede, not to the United States, but to those friendly Indians the lands thus occupied. There was no absolute cession. The gentleman seems not to know that. If he will look at article 16, of the treaty, he will see that he not merely seems not to know it, but is absolutely ignorant of it.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman yield at this point to allow that sixteenth article to be read?

Mr. BARNES. Certainly. I know I am right in my recollection of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The sixteenth article of the treaty of 1866 (14 Statutes, 804) provides that the United States may settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of 96° of longitude, to be taken in a compact form in quantity not exceeding 160 acres for each member of said tribes thus to be settled; the boundaries of said districts to be distinctly marked, and the land conveyed in fee-simple title to each of said tribes, to be held in common or by their members in severalty, as the United States may decide; the Cherokee Nation to retain the right of possession and jurisdiction over all of said country west of 96° of longitude until thus sold and occupied.

Mr. BARNES. Now, there it is, Mr. Chairman, exactly in accordance with my recollection. There was no absolute cession. There was an agreement to cede—to whom? To the friendly Indians whom the United States might locate on these lands; and there was also in that article an absolute declaration that the Cherokees should retain full control and jurisdiction over all of the land that was not thus occupied and settled.

Now, a word or two about this other matter to which allusion has been made. Subsequently there were some negotiations between certain parties claiming to represent the Indians in reference to an absolute sale of these lands; and I believe that Mr. Teller, when Secretary of the Interior, did recommend that the Government should purchase those lands.

But the Government did not make the purchase. It was a recognized fact that if the Government should go on and select certain lands in a certain portion of the Territory and settle Indians upon them, and should leave in the hands of the Cherokees those lands which were less valuable, there would arise an equitable reason in favor of the Cherokees why the other lands should be sold, and sold at a good price. Instead of that, what did the Government do? It did not make any appropriation for the purchase of the land. It can not be shown that there was any act of the national council of the Cherokees by which these parties who are conducting these negotiations here were authorized to act for the Cherokee Nation. There is no pretense that they had any authority whatsoever. They claimed to represent the Cherokee Nation at that time; but where is the evidence that they did represent it? Where is the act of the Cherokee council, signed by its governor, which bound the Cherokee Nation?

And, Mr. Chairman, what was the action of the Government of the United States? In consequence of those equities, it made an additional appropriation—I think it is in the act of 1872—for the sum of $300,000; and, mark you, if you will turn to the act of 1872 you will find that this sum of $300,000 is on account of the lands which were occupied, not the lands over which the Indians under the terms of the treaty retained absolute jurisdiction and sovereignty until they were occupied.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman allow me a remark?

Mr. BARNES. Certainly.

Mr. SYMES. The appropriation exceeded to quite an extent the amount due for the land already occupied by friendly Indians.

Mr. BARNES. But it was not in part payment; not at all.

Mr. SYMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARNES. No, it was not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I renew the pro forma amendment. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] seems to think I have forgotten a good many things which I ought to have known. Yet the very matter which he claims I have forgotten seems never to have existed. Why, according to his own argument, these Cherokees have an equity. When you want to embrace these lands within the limits of this Territory, which you designed for the white people, he himself admits that the Cherokees have an equity. Why, sir, it has been well said by my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARNES], and it is demonstrated by the reading of the sixteenth article of the treaty of 1866, that there never was a cession. I care not what Attorneys-General or Secretaries of the Interior may have said, there is no record evidence of a cession of this land by the Cherokees to the United States for any other purpose except the settlement of friendly Indians upon it, with their consent, and a sale of the land to them; and if for the purpose of carrying out the duty which the Government of the United States owed to these houseless and homeless and nomadic tribes of Indians to settle them somewhere permanently, if in carrying out this duty they chose to negotiate with the Cherokees for the settlement of their lands by their consent, then that was right and proper.

According to his own concession these people had no right to act as delegates from the Cherokee Nation to make actual bestowal of this land to the Government of the United States for any other purpose except the purpose of settling these friendly Indians, reserving under the terms of the treaty in the sixteenth article authority to the Cherokee Nation over the territory ceded.

Here it will be observed, Mr. Chairman, so far from displaying, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] thinks, forgetfulness about these facts that are as stated in the terms of the treaty itself in the sixteenth article, this cession to the United States, whether for large or small consideration, was a cession for the purpose of settling friendly Indians by consent of the United States on that land. Yet, according to the confession of the gentleman from Colorado, the money was not paid for even this cession.

Now, what is proposed by the terms of this bill in this section? It is absolutely to take possession of this land without getting the consent of the Cherokees themselves in proper form. And the gentleman himself has said these other Indians have rights there if the Cherokees have ceded this land to them and the United States has paid consideration money to them, and they ought to be consulted as well as the Cherokees. In other words, under the law as it now stands—and that I think I do know—there is not a foot of land within the Cherokee Strip which you design to embrace in this abnormal Territory of Oklahoma—a Territory without boundary, without defined ownership of land, without citizens there asking it—which you do not propose now by this bill, under the terms of this section, to take in an illegal manner whether the Indians consent to it or not.

If the gentleman from Colorado is right the Indians do not own the land; then why do you ask them for their consent? Why do you provide in the bill to ask their consent? It was because, sir, the framers of this bill knew that the Indians did have rights through the conveyance of the public lands by the Government into the possession of citizens or tribes of Indians. If the Indians did not have these rights, why then was it necessary to provide in this bill for their consent? If they were not the owners of the land, why was it necessary to ask for their consent? If, as the gentleman from Colorado has stated, this land was purchased by the United States and paid for by the United States and it was deeded to the United States, why then the necessity of getting any consent from these Indians? Yet the bill is based on the idea you must have their consent to the terms proposed. During the whole progress of the debate, both before and now, it has been conceded there would be no legal organization of the Territory of Oklahoma without the consent of these Indians who own this land, it having been deeded to them by the Government of the United States and can not be taken from them without their consent.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, it is as well to stick to the question under discussion. It has been conceded in the argument, and it is conceded in this bill, before the Cherokee Outlet can be opened to settlement, before any settler can go on the land, the consent of the Cherokees must be first had and obtained. I say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] he will search the legislation of this country in vain to find a measure as equitable, as liberal in its terms to the Indians, as is the bill under consideration. Now, sir, we may bandy words and accuse one another of forgetting or not knowing the principles involved, but I know this, the chief law officer of the Government, not only of this Administration but of preceding administrations, has decided that the Cherokees have no right to this Outlet for the purpose of residence.

I know that the chief law officer (the Attorney-General) has decided that the pretended leases under which the cattle syndicates held possession of that Outlet, at a mere nominal price of about 3 cents an acre, where they graze their enormous herds without paying a cent of tax on the land or a cent of tax on their cattle, being exempted from the process of the law, he has decided that there is no warrant of law for these leases. I know, sir, that the late Secretary of the Interior, now an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, held the men occupying the Outlet with their cattle were there simply by sufferance of the Government; that their leases, their pretended leases, as he calls them, can be canceled at any time. The present Secretary of the Interior, by his recent order, evidently entertains the same views.

Mr. BARNES. I do not think that Mr. Lamar so held, although I believe the gentleman is correct about the Attorney-General.

Mr. WARNER. And Secretary Lamar also, because in reference to this he used nearly this identical language I have given, and I will show it to the gentleman. He directed that the parties holding under these pretended leases—

> Be informed that any so-called lease or other arrangements into which they or any other parties may enter with the Cherokee Nation for the occupation of the Cherokee Outlet with their cattle for grazing purposes will be subject to cancellation or discontinuance by the Department at any time.

There can be no mistaking this language. This question was raised with the purpose of defeating the passage of the bill in the Forty-ninth Congress. Then the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] relied on the opinion of Judge Parker, of the United States district court of Arkansas, in the case of United States vs. Rodgers. In June of last year Judge Brewer, of the United States circuit court, expressly overruled Judge Parker. In his opinion he uses this language:

> Manifestly Congress set apart the 7,000,000 acres as a home, and that was thereafter to be regarded as set aside and occupied, because, as expressed in the preamble of the treaty, Congress was intent upon securing a permanent home; beyond that the guaranty was of an outlet—not territory for residence, but for passage ground, over which the Cherokees might pass to all the unoccupied domain West. But while the exclusive right to this outlet was guarantied, while patent was issued conveying this outlet, it was described and intended obviously as an outlet and not as a home. (U. S. vs. Soule et al., 30 Fed. R., page 918.)

Every man who has carefully read the treaties, it seems to me, must come to the conclusion reached by the learned judge in the opinion just quoted. I have carefully read every line of these treaties and honestly tried to come to an intelligent conclusion upon them, one which should do absolute justice to the Indians; and, Mr. Chairman, my reading and study upon the subject have led me to the irresistible conclusion which I have endeavored to maintain in my advocacy of this bill upon the floor of the House as a legislator.

I submit, therefore, to any gentleman that if he will read the record running through the various treaties, and the letter of Mr. Calhoun when he was Secretary of War, he will find that the additional 7,000,000 acres known as the Outlet were given them as an outlet exclusively, and not for homes. Seven million acres were given them as a home and the rest as an outlet to the West, the then great unbounded, unknown, unoccupied West. And, sir, it is a part of the current history of the country that when the unoccupied West became occupied, when the game had disappeared before advancing civilization, when there was no further use for the Outlet "as a passage to the great West," then it was that the Cherokees came to the Congress of the United States and by the recommendation of General Francis Walker, then Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a law was passed which authorized the President and the Secretary of the Interior to make an appraisement of the Cherokee lands and of the lands of the Osage Indians in the Indian Territory to the southern line of Kansas, and ceded to the United States by the Cherokee Indians.

In accordance with the provisions of this law the President of the United States appointed appraisers to appraise this Outlet. Let us bear in mind as one fact in the discussion of this question that there was at this time an entire willingness upon the part of the Cherokees to part with whatever interest they might have in this Outlet.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COBB was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. WARNER.

Mr. WARNER. I thank my friend from Alabama for the courtesy.

I do not wish to take up the time of the committee, but I think we ought to understand this question fully.

I repeat, sir, that there was at that time a perfect willingness on the part of the Cherokees to part with the land. Now, I live, sir, in a region of country possibly as much benefited, if there be a cattle syndicate controlling this matter, as any other section of the Union, and more so, because certainly my city is the head-center of the cattle interest of the Western country. But at the time when the Cherokees were willing to enter into the negotiations and did enter into them, the cattle syndicates had not then gotten possession of the Cherokee Outlet. I simply say, therefore, that there seems to be something now in existence fighting this bill at every step that did not exist then—the cattle syndicate exists now and it did not exist at that time. Whether it is the influence obstructing this bill at every step I certainly do not say.

Under the law of 1877 the President appointed the appraisers. The lands occupied by the Pawnees in the Outlet were appraised at 70 cents an acre, and the remainder of the land, 6,344,562.1 acres, was valued at 47.49 cents per acre. This appraisement was regarded as fair. The gentleman from Georgia shakes his head.

Mr. BARNES. Were the Cherokees parties to the appraisement?

Mr. WARNER. I will answer the gentleman's question as I proceed if he will not anticipate me, and I will show him that the Cherokees were parties. I will show him that they recognized the appraisement. I will show that not only were they parties, but that as such they were paid a part of the money upon the assessed valuation in excess of any lands ever occupied by friendly tribes of Indians.

Now, two or three years after this appraisement was made, as I wish to treat this question fairly, giving each side of it, the Cherokees made a complaint to the General Government. The nature of the complaint was not that the lands were not appraised at a sufficient price, not that the amount was inadequate, but it was that the Government had located friendly Indians in the eastern part of the Cherokee Outlet, the more valuable part as they claimed, using merely the language used by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to-day in the course of the discussion, and leaving them the western part, which they thought less valuable, and hence that they were not being treated fairly. They claimed at that time this: That the entire amount of the appraisement, with, I think, 5 per cent. interest, was due and should be paid them in the aggregate. Upon this claim Secretary Kirkwood says (I read from the official document):

> Although in this matter the Cherokees have some cause of complaint that they have not been fairly dealt by, I think also that their demand for the present payment for all the land is not quite reasonable, and that their demand for interest, as set forth in their communication to me, is extravagant.

Then he proposes this remedy. Now, if the gentleman from Georgia will give me his attention. The remedy was—

> That the United States shall pay them the appraised value, 47.49 cents per acre, for as much land in the extreme western and less valuable parts of the cession as has been occupied in the eastern and more valuable parts thereof. (H. R. Ex. Doc. 89, Forty-seventh Congress.)

In pursuance of this arrangement $300,000 was appropriated, was paid to and received by the Cherokees.

Mr. WEAVER. Was not part of it in excess?

Mr. WARNER. They had already been paid nearly $50,000 in excess of the valuation of the territory occupied by friendly Indians, and the $300,000 was paid to carry out the recommendation of Secretary Kirkwood, to pay for an equal amount in the western or less valuable part of the Outlet to what had been occupied in the eastern or more valuable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WARNER. I wish a moment or two more.

Mr. BIGGS. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized, I desire to give the gentleman from Missouri a portion of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California yields a portion of his time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WARNER. I am obliged to my friend from California [Mr. BIGGS], and I will try not to occupy more than five minutes.

I will say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] that I know he has read these treaties carefully, and he must remember that under the terms of the appropriation of this $300,000 that was paid to the Cherokees in excess, that the terms were that it was to be paid to them out of funds due them under the appraisement of their lands west of the Arkansas River. Was it not?

Mr. BARNES. I will have it read directly. That will be the best way.

Mr. WARNER. If you have the law there I will read it. I wish to read it. The gentleman from Georgia kindly furnishes me the authority, and I find that my memery had not betrayed me. Here is the appropriation:

> That the sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated to be paid into the treasury of the Cherokee Nation out of funds due under the appraisement of the Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River; which sum shall be expended as the acts of the Cherokee Legislature direct.

Mr. BARNES. Go on.

Mr. WARNER. The other provision does not affect that.

Mr. BARNES. I think it does.

Mr. WARNER. The Cherokees had sold a part of their land to friendly Indians there, and they were dissatisfied in some way, and the condition of this was that they give them title.

But, sir, here is the provision by which $300,000 was appropriated, and to be paid from what fund? Will the gentleman from Mississippi say that the Congress of the United States did not know what they were doing, and the Secretary of the Interior did not know what he was doing? It was to be paid out of the fund "due the Cherokees under the appraisement of the Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River." It was not paid for a part of their tract. It was paid on the appraisement of the tract as an entirety. They had already received over $300,000, and this was an additional amount. And how was it to be paid? "Into the treasury of the Cherokee Nation." How is it to be expended? "In such a manner as the Cherokee council shall direct."

Was not the Cherokee Nation a party to that? Did not the Cherokee Nation receive the $300,000 with a full knowledge of the appraisement? Did it not expend the $300,000 on the conditions upon which it had been received?

The bill proposes to acquire from the Cherokees any title or claim they may have. It proposes, Mr. Chairman, by amendments which we shall offer, to make it a penal offense for any citizen to enter upon any part of the Indian Territory until the assent of the Indians is first had, and the proclamation of the President, in accordance with the terms of this bill, has been issued; and further than that, it provides that any person violating this provision shall never thereafter be permitted to own or acquire title to real estate in the Territory. It provides further, I will say to the gentlemen from Mississippi, thinking that it might meet the wishes of the gentlemen—believing them to be sincere in their objection to this bill, claiming that it is an outrage to extend the Territory over any part of the Indian Territory until the assent of the Indians directly interested in that part of the Territory has first been obtained—it provides that until such assent is obtained the Territorial government should not be extended over it.

These amendments are proposed to be offered to this bill, throwing around it every safeguard that it is possible to do. And I will say to the gentleman now, that, so far as I am concerned, there is no amendment that he can offer that looks to carrying out the purpose of opening this Territory to settlement, throwing it open to make it add to the wealth of the United States, instead of being a stumbling-block in the way of civilization and a Chinese wall between our Western States—no amendment looking in good faith to the carrying out of this idea and protecting the interest of the Indians there, whatever it may be, that I will be found opposing. What I object to is this consumption of time by calling a quorum upon immaterial amendments, which is an obstructive policy to defeat this legislation.

Mr. HOOKER. That is our purpose.

Mr. WARNER. Yes, I know it is.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the pro forma amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. BARNES. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I have but a word or two to say in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], and I shall address myself to two points: first, the question of title, and second, the question, for what was the appropriation of $300,000 made? Had the gentleman read all the law which I handed him I would not occupy even the time which I am now compelled to occupy.

First, as to the question of title, I am not going into the argument about what Mr. Calhoun thought, about what was the original grant of this Outlet, or what may have been the opinion of this, that, or the other judge. The question of title, Mr. Chairman, is fully settled, it seems to me, clearly and indisputably settled, by the sixteenth article of the treaty with the United States. In that article it is provided—

> That the United States may settle friendly Indians in any part of the Cherokee country west of 96°, to be taken in compact form, in quantity not exceeding 160 acres for each member of each of said tribes thus to be settled, the boundaries of said district to be distinctly marked and the land conveyed—> conveyed in fee-simple to each of said tribes.

That is the language of the treaty.

Who was to convey it? Not the United States. It was to be conveyed by the Cherokee Nation. How was the Cherokee Nation to convey a title in fee-simple to these friendly Indians whom the Government might locate on those lands if they did not have a fee-simple title to convey? If there was not a fee-simple title in the Cherokee Nation how was the United States to get a fee-simple title out of that nation for those friendly Indians? They could not convey what they did not have. They could not convey a title which was not theirs. The Government recognized the fact that there was a fee-simple title in the Cherokee Nation by making this sixteenth article of the treaty. Those Indians, I repeat, could not pass to another tribe that which they did not possess; yet the Government obligated them that whenever those lands should be occupied by the friendly Indians whom the Government might locate thereon, they, the Cherokee Nation, must make a fee-simple title. So much for the question of title.

Now, in reference to the appropriation to those Indians, I will not go over the whole question about the negotiation which took place here, or about whether or not the Cherokees were or were not a party to this appraisement. There can be no question of the fact; the history of the transaction shows that the appraisement was undertaken by the United States Government. I grant that there were parties here pretending to represent the Cherokee Nation and claiming that there should be a payment made, but I deny that there can be any evidence produced to show that the Cherokee council ever approved or authorized it.

Now, as to the appropriation of $300,000, my friend from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] read a part of the clause, but not the whole of it. I read:

That the sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid into the treasury of the Cherokee Nation out of the funds due under appraisement, for Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River, which sum shall be expended as the acts of the Cherokee Legislature direct; this amount to be immediately available.

So far so good. That is what the Government was to do. Now, what was the Cherokee Nation to do?

Provided, That the Cherokee Nation, through its proper authorities, its governor and its legislative council representing its government, shall execute conveyances—shall execute conveyances satisfactorily to the Secretary of the Interior—

What sort of conveyances?—

In fee simple, of course, as the sixteenth article of the treaty provided. To whom? To the United States; not absolutely, but as a trustee, in trust only for the benefit of the Pawnees (and the other tribes enumerated); not Indians to be settled upon those lands thereafter, not a new settlement, but Indians then occupying the said tract, "as they respectively occupied the same before the payment of said sum of money."

Mr. WARNER. Does the gentleman say that the $300,000 was paid for that purpose?

Mr. BARNES. I say it was to be paid in trust for that purpose. I do not say anything beyond what the act says. There is the act. It speaks for itself.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman has read, I am sure, the executive documents accompanying the report of Secretary Kirkwood.

Mr. BARNES. I have.

Mr. WARNER. And does not the gentleman know that the $300,000 was paid for an equal amount in the western portion of the Outlet to the amounts taken in the eastern portion?

Mr. BARNES. I understand exactly what it was for. It was because the Secretary of the Interior himself recognized that there were certain equities in behalf of these Indians growing out of the fact that the Government was locating certain tribes on the best portion of the lands; and as a result this appropriation of $300,000 was made. As to what it was made for, there is no occasion for any dispute between the gentleman and myself, because here is the record; here is the statute to speak for itself. This appropriation was only to be paid if the Cherokee Nation would execute conveyances satisfactory to the Department of the Interior in fee-simple—for that was the only form of conveyance which could have been satisfactory—conveyances in trust to the Government of the United States for those tribes who were already upon the land, occupying a part of it.

The CHAIRMAN, having put the question upon the amendment of Mr. HOOKER, said: The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HOOKER. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 6, noes 58.

Mr. HOOKER. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. If gentlemen desire further debate, I have no objection to an extension of the time; but I think so emphatic an expression as this ought to satisfy gentlemen, unless they desire further debate, and they should permit us to proceed to some other provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made by the gentleman from Mississippi, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 92.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum has yet voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the point of no quorum insisted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been withdrawn.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the point is insisted upon, I demand that the roll be called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

Allen, Mass.	Brown, J. R., Va.	Dargan,	Glover,
Anderson, Iowa	Brumm,	Davenport,	Goff,
Anderson, Ill.	Burnes,	Davidson, Ala.	Granger,

The roll-call being concluded, the committee, under the rule, rose; and Mr. OATES having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, the Chairman had caused the roll to be called, and now reported the names of the absentees to the House, to be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the roll-call just taken, 205 members have answered to their names. This being more than a quorum, the Committee of the Whole will, under the rule, resume its sitting.

The House accordingly resolved itself again into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] will act as tellers.

The tellers resumed the count, and reported—ayes 38, noes 134.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand exactly how this vote has been taken. The point of "no quorum" having been raised, the count by the tellers was discontinued, and the roll was called. I submit that the question should have been again taken de novo.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that where no proceedings have taken place other than a mere call of the roll, and the committee after reporting the absentees to the House immediately resumes its session without intervening business, the count by the tellers is resumed where it was left off.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the practice at the last session.

Mr. HOOKER. I thought the ruling and the practice had been just the opposite.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling at the last session, when this bill was under consideration, was in harmony with the ruling just announced.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the end of the pending section. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 6 the following:

"The commission hereinafter provided for may incorporate in any agreement made with the Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of Indians a provision to the effect that one-fourth of the proceeds arising from the sale of the lands mentioned in the fifth and sixth sections of this act shall be distributed pro rata among the members of such tribes, according to their respective interests in such land, and that such amounts so to be distributed may be out of the first moneys received from the sale of such lands."

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply provides that the commission to treat with these Indians may in its discretion agree to a provision that a portion of the proceeds of this land may be distributed pro rata to the tribes, so that each member of the tribes can get his respective interest and benefit from it. The provisions of the bill require the proceeds should be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and interest paid to the respective tribes from time to time. The objection to the ratification of some of the treaties has been the money went into the Treasury and was controlled by the legislative department, and the masses of the people did not get any benefit from it. This is for the purpose of enabling the commission in its discretion to agree that a portion not exceeding one-fourth may be given to the Indians pro rata. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. COBB. This is nothing more nor less than a provision for the purpose of bribing these Indians to give their consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the whole proposition is to bribe them to settle. It is tendering them consideration for their land, and if they own this land, and we are going to pay them for it, why not let them have it according to their interest? It is no more proper one way than the other. It is all bribery on that plan to give the Indians anything. We propose to pay them for this land. If that is bribery, then the gentleman was guilty of bribery when he agreed to pay the Sioux Indians for the 11,000,000 acres we got from them. If this is bribery that also was bribery.

But I do not so understand it that if the Indians own an interest in this land and you propose to pay them for it it would come under the head of bribery. If you propose to pay the Indians for the land, no matter what the title is, the bill proceeds on the ground they have title, and we buy it from them, and the Indians say, "You buy the land, and we have each an interest in it, and we want our share." This is in the discretion of the commission and will enable each individual Indian to have his distributive share of the proceeds of the land. How would you proceed to do justice if you do not allow them a pro rata share? That is the proposition here, to allow them pro rata to have their share of the proceeds of this land. Such is the case with reference to all these Indians, with the exception only of the five civilized tribes, where they have organized governments, and it is proposed to put the money into the Treasury and let it be distributed by the legislative department. I think this is a fair proposition. It is for the commission to determine. It is a fair proposition to let them have their pro rata share of the proceeds of their lands.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, there has been great complaint from time to time as to the conduct of these commissioners for the purpose of gaining the assent of the Indians to propositions such as this. There is no necessity here why the commissioners should be vested with the power to distribute any part of this money. It is not presently needed, particularly by these Indians, and why should there be a distribution so a part may be paid to individual Indians whose consent is to be obtained?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman misunderstands the proposition. The commission can not pay them for anything, but by this agreement under any contract of sale the first proceeds, instead of going into the Treasury, will be distributed to these Indians under the regulation of the Secretary of the Treasury. This would not come in for three, four, five, or six months after the agreement had been made and signed.

Mr. WEAVER. But not unless the representatives of the Indians themselves and the Cherokee council consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course the representatives of these Indians must consent.

Mr. COBB. Does it not provide these Indians, whose consent is sought to be obtained, if they will sign this agreement, they shall have so many dollars and cents paid to them individually?

Mr. SPRINGER. It does, certainly, in the time prescribed in the bill, which will be after the settlers have made their first payment and the money has been received at the Land Office of the Government, and then accounted for through the legislative department to the respective tribes. It will be all controlled through the legislative power of the nation.

Mr. SPINOLA. I would like to ask this question: How much of this land has been located already under railroad grants?

Mr. SPRINGER. None at all; not an acre of it, nor can any be, except, of course, the 200 feet in width for the right of way granted to certain railroads which have permission to go through the Territory.

Mr. COBB. My objection goes to the point that you are arming these commissioners with a power of making an appeal; I called it bribery, but perhaps that would be too strong a term to use, but it is placing in the hands of the commissioners proposed to be appointed a power that ought not to be given them, to induce the Indians whose assent is sought to be obtained to give it by holding out to them the hope that in a short time thereafter they will individually receive certain payments—so many dollars and cents.

Mr. WEAVER. But the assent is to be obtained by the council and those who represent officially the tribes. It is not proposed that this commission shall seek the assent of the individual Indians.

Mr. COBB. Are these commissioners not authorized and empowered to get the assent of the Indians?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; but not individually.

Mr. SPRINGER. They get it through the legislative council of the nation. They have members of their own council elected, and the business of the nation is transacted through the council in the same manner that our business is transacted here. They have representatives in the council who form the government of the nation, and they, the commissioners, would treat with them in regard to this matter.

Mr. COBB. But why make this provision in the bill? Why insert such an exception as it seems to be?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is for the benefit of the Indians themselves. If they do not want to make the provision it is for them to say so.

Mr. WEAVER. It is for the approval of the people there, and if it is beneficial to them in their opinion they will get the benefit of it. It is desirable that some such provision should be enacted, and not have these people manipulated by syndicates. There is nothing wrong in the amendment, and it certainly ought to prevail.

Mr. COBB. This is a fund to be paid into the Treasury, and to be held in trust for the benefit of the Indians, to be paid out from time to time as the Congress of the United States may direct, or as these stipulations of the agreement may require. There is no present need, so far as the Indians are concerned, why such a provision should be inserted in the bill at all. They are not needing the money; their necessities do not require its immediate payment; and it looks at least in the direction of an agency being placed in the hands either of the commissioners or of the representatives of the tribe to make an undue appeal and exercise undue influence over the individual Indians of the tribe whose assent is required.

Mr. BIGGS. But you must get the assent of the Indians in some manner, and it will be obtained by their own council.

Mr. WEAVER. Let me state to the gentleman from Alabama that if the Indians do not need the money the council which acts for them will not pay it out. It is a matter left discretionary with the council.

Mr. COBB. I do not know about that. The council may be in favor of giving the assent.

Mr. WEAVER. And if they do not want the money, why, this payment will not be made.

Mr. COBB. And the council may be in favor of the assent while some or many of the individual Indians may not, and you give them an opportunity of exercising an undue influence over the Indians. We all remember the complaints recently made with reference to the attempt to unduly influence these very Sioux Indians to give their assent to the treaty presented to them. The public prints were filled with it to such an extent that the complaint finally came here and was made in this House, and an inquiry was set on foot to ascertain whether or not there was any foundation for the charge. It was alleged that the commissioners were attempting to influence the Indians unduly, to constrain them to give their assent to the proposition submitted. Now, this would be in the nature of a constraint. We present to the Indian a proposition that if he signs an agreement the Government will see to it that he receives as the result of that consent so much money in dollars and cents paid to him individually, not perhaps directly for his consent, but as a direct result of it. I see no necessity for the amendment and oppose it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories. That amendment provides that the commission hereafter to be established may do a certain thing. The language of the amendment is:

The commission hereinafter provided for.

And in order to know what that means we have to turn over to the eleventh section of the bill, which makes provision for the creation of the commission to which reference is there made. Therein it is provided:

SEC. 11. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission to be composed of five persons, not more than three of whom shall be members of one political party, whose duty it shall be to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees, for the purpose of securing the consent of said Indians, so far as it may be necessary, to the provisions of section 5 and section 6 of this act.

And I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this language is used here:

So far as it may be necessary.

The section then goes on to provide:

The commission is authorized to enter into such agreements with said Indian tribes as it may deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, and shall submit the same to the President for his approval or rejection. The compensation of the members of said commission shall be at the rate of $10 per day; and they shall also be allowed, in addition thereto, their actual necessary traveling expenses, stationery, and postage. They shall have power to appoint a secretary, who shall receive a compensation of $6 per day and such allowances for traveling expenses as he may actually incur.

Now, this is the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on the Territories to the sixth section of the bill:

That the commission hereinafter provided for—

That is, provided for in the eleventh section—

may incorporate into any agreement made with the Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of Indians a provision to the effect that one-fourth of the proceeds arising from the sale of the lands mentioned in the fifth and sixth sections of the act shall be distributed pro rata among the members of such tribes, according to their respective interests in said lands; and that such amounts are to be distributed out of the first moneys arising from the sale of such lands.

Now, it will be observed that the provisions of this bill fix the price of the lands at $1.25 per acre, and it is proposed by the amendment, in contravention, I think, of the spirit of the bill, although the amendments to the bill seem to be but a chapter of contradictions, paralleled only by the bill as an entirety, to make a change from what the bill itself provides, because the sixth section of the bill provides:

An accurate account shall be kept by the Secretary of the Interior of the money received as proceeds of the sale of said lands, and said money shall be placed to the credit of the Cherokee Indian tribe in the Treasury of the United States, after deducting the cost of the sale by the United States and the amount heretofore appropriated and paid to the Cherokee tribe as part compensation for said unoccupied lands.

Thus it will be observed that the order for the sale of these lands is arbitrary, fixing the price at $1.25 an acre, and that the Cherokees shall return what has been appropriated by the United States heretofore, and that they shall pay the expenses of the sale. Now, sir, if all these things are to be done, is it not of greater moment that the assent of the Indians shall first be had in this matter? Now, it is proposed in this amendment to enable the commission to say to these Indians that it shall apportion so much pro rata to the other Indians. It is stated in another section of the bill, or in an amendment, that the Seminoles have no interest in it. That is in contravention of the view taken by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], that there are other Indians having an interest in this matter. They are to be placated in order to get their consent to the establishment of the Territory. It was originally proposed to clothe these commissioners with power to make provision for the sale. Now it is proposed that they shall be clothed with authority to take part of the first proceeds of the sale of these lands and distribute it to the respective tribes. I say, therefore, that the amendment is in contravention of the other amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOOKER. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman does not desire to misrepresent me. I was speaking of the Cherokees. I was simply speaking in reference to the Cherokee Outlet. The Creek and Seminoles' claim is entirely different and distinct. They have no interest in the Outlet.

Mr. HOOKER. Then if they have not, why should they be paid out of that fund?

Mr. WARNER. Because part of this is for lands they have an interest in.

Mr. HOOKER. This amendment proposes that they shall have power to give to the Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles a portion of the amount, extending to one-fourth of the proceeds of the sale of the land, to be paid out of the first sales of the land. If they are not interested in it——

Mr. SPRINGER. According to their respective interests.

Mr. HOOKER. If they have no interest, why do you want to give them money?

Mr. SPRINGER. If they have any interest.

Mr. HOOKER. Then somebody has got an interest besides the Seminoles. All those to whom cession was made for the purpose of settling friendly Indians have just as much interest in the occupancy of these lands as the Seminoles, and are just as much entitled to the proceeds of the sale if the sale shall be made. I say, therefore, this amendment is absolutely in antagonism to the principles of the very portion of the bill to which it proposes to be an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I supposed that this proposition was in the interest of those who claimed to be the friends of the Indians; and as they do not seem to want it, I am sure I do not, and I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the President may, at such times as he may deem it necessary, direct land offices to be opened in the Territory of Oklahoma, not to exceed four in number, and may nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint the usual officers to conduct the business of said land offices; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall, when directed by the President, cause the various portions of said lands to be properly surveyed and subdivided, where the same has not already been done. It is hereby made the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to carefully examine each claim taken under the provisions of this act before issuing a patent to the claimant; and if it shall appear that said claim was not taken in good faith, he shall refuse a patent and declare all prior proceedings before had in such case to be null and void; and all persons settling on lands under the provisions of this act shall be required to select the same in square form, as near as may be, and to maintain a continuous personal residence of three years on the land, and to improve and cultivate the same for that period in the manner required by the homestead laws before obtaining title thereto; but payments for lands, where payment is required to be made by this act, shall be made in four equal installments, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, as follows: The first payment shall be made within six months from the time of entry, the second at the expiration of one year from date of entry, the third at the expiration of two years from date of entry, and the final payment shall be made at the expiration of three years from the date of entry: Provided, That there shall be reserved public highways 4 rods wide around every section of land in said Territory, the section lines being the center of said highways; but no deduction shall be made in the amount to be paid for each quarter-section of land by reason of such reservation.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the following amendment, to go in at the end.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to add to the section the following:

"But if the said highways shall be vacated by any competent authority, the title to the respective highway shall inure to the then owner of the tract of which it formed a part by the original survey."

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no objection to that, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to strike out line 13, and the word "faith" in line 14, and insert: "The entryman shall be required to make full proofs, and unless it shall appear that the claim was taken in good faith and that there has been full performance of all the terms and requirements under this act."

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is expressly provided that the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors in the late civil war to make homes on the public lands under the existing homestead laws shall not in any degree be impaired by the passage of this bill; and the right of such honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors to make homestead entry and perfect the same by occupancy under the existing homestead law shall extend to any and all lands which shall be open to any settlement by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the substance of this proposition was voted down at another stage of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. That was a very different proposition.

Mr. WARNER. I will say to the chairman of the committee that I submitted an amendment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and said that I would offer it to the committee, making it explicitly say that the rights of the soldier should be protected in this bill the same as they are under the homestead law.

Mr. RYAN. As I understand it, it only applies existing law to this Territory.

Mr. PAYSON. That is all. It applies existing law to this Territory in favor of honorably discharged Union soldiers.

Mr. WEAVER. Who will pay the Indians for the land the soldier takes?

Mr. PAYSON. The General Government will pay the Indians for the land.

Mr. WEAVER. Then when a soldier goes there and settles upon a piece of land you propose to have Government appropriate the money out of the Treasury to pay for it?

Mr. PAYSON. I propose to have the Government do precisely what that amendment in terms proposes.

Mr. WEAVER. I simply want the House to understand it.

Mr. PAYSON. If I can have the attention of the House I will explain it. Mr. Chairman, under existing law every honorably discharged Union soldier has the right, when he, in good faith, goes upon a piece of public land not exceeding 160 acres in area, the surveys composing it being of compact form, and makes his home upon it for five successive years less the term that he was in actual service, to have the Government of the United States make him a title to that land. That, I say, is existing law. Prior to the passage of section 2305 of the Revised Statutes, a soldier, like anybody else, was compelled to reside for five years on the land before a title could issue to him, but that section provides in these words:

That the time which the homestead settler has served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps shall be deducted from the time heretofore required to perfect title, or, if discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty, then the term of enlistment shall be deducted from the time heretofore required to perfect title, without reference to the length of time he may actually have served, but no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated, the homestead for a period of at least one year after he shall have commenced his improvement.

There is the law, and it is all in a nut-shell, requiring permanent residence and improvement for at least one year, but the time may extend to the whole five years, less the term he was actually in service, unless discharged by reason of wounds received. This bill provides that no land affected by its provision shall be disposed of except upon payment, by the parties going into possession, of at least one dollar and a quarter per acre, and this amendment provides that, as to the land embraced within the scope of this bill, the rights of an honorably discharged Union soldier shall not be impaired by reason of anything in the bill as against the right given him under existing law. Now, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] asks me who is to pay for this land, I answer that the General Government is to pay for it if it has to be paid for. The amount that will have to be paid for it is whatever the bill provides.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not so solicitous as to the amount of money which the Government may have to pay these Indians for whatever equity they may be found to have in this land as I am to insist upon it that this House shall pass upon the question whether the rights of an honorably discharged Union soldier under existing law shall be impaired by reason of the passage of this bill, and that for the first time in the history of our public-land legislation; for I assert here, Mr. Chairman, that this is the first time in the history of public-land legislation that it was ever attempted to impair or to detract from the rights which the honorably discharged Union soldier has to go and make a home for himself upon the public domain.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will ask my colleague whether the Sioux treaty bill passed at the last session did not have a similar provision to that contained in this bill, requiring everybody to pay a certain price for those lands?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes; but I am speaking of a great body of land.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was a great body of land, larger than this—eleven millions of acres.

Mr. PAYSON. Let my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] put himself upon record in opposition to this amendment if he desires to do so, but I make the prediction that he will not do it on a yea-and-nay vote in this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will do it here, and upon a yea-and-nay vote in the House of Representatives, and before your constituents and mine; and I say to you now that there never was a proposition that was more demagogical than your proposition is, and you know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYSON. Let us see what I know. Let us see whether this proposition is demagogical or not. Has the gentleman ever seen the time since I have been a member of Congress when I have not insisted that every acre of the public lands should be open to disposition only under the homestead law?

My colleague is very glib in imputing motives to other gentlemen. I serve notice upon him now and here that I do not need nor do I receive any advice from him as to what my course shall be with reference to public questions. It is enough for him to know, and for the people of the country to know, so far as they care to observe my course, that it has been a consistent one from the time I entered Congress down to this moment; and I do not propose to break the record. I propose to insist, as I have done upon this bill, not only in behalf of the Union soldier, but in behalf of the landless poor everywhere who may choose to go upon this land, that they may have a free home, if they will endure the privations which they have to undergo in making a home there. That has always been my doctrine, as it is to-day. Before the general question shall be voted upon, I insist that we should adopt a proposition declaring that the Union soldier at least shall have a right to a free home upon this last great body of agricultural land which will be open to general settlement; for this is the last.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no member of this House in my devotion to the interests of those who followed the flag during the late war. But this is a proposition to stab this bill under the pretense, as I believe, of favoring the Union soldier; nothing else. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] can not point to a case in the whole history of the land legislation of this country where there ever was a proposition—save the one made at the last session in connection with this bill—to purchase land from the Indians at $1.25 per acre and then allow the soldiers to occupy it without paying anything for it. I say the gentleman can not point to a precedent in the history of this country where that has ever been done; if he thinks he can, I will give him part of my time now in which to correct me.

Mr. PAYSON. I shall have plenty of time of my own to correct the gentleman, if I deem it necessary.

Mr. WEAVER. There is no such precedent in the history of this country. What does this amendment amount to? It amounts to a proposition to open that country to settlement, and in every instance where the settler shall be a Union soldier to appropriate $200 out of the Treasury of the United States for his benefit. It is a proposition to tax a part of the Union soldiers, those who do not go upon this land—ay, it is a proposition to tax the whole sixty million people of this country for the benefit of the ex-soldiers who may go into this Territory. The amendment, if adopted, will involve an expenditure of perhaps twenty or thirty millions of dollars, and will defeat the bill. This is its object, or I am greatly mistaken.

I stand as close to the soldiers of the nation as the gentleman from Illinois; but I never have heard of a Union soldier who asked for any such amendment to this bill; and it is not offered in the interest of the Union soldiers.

If this were public land, land already belonging to the Government of the United States, I would favor the amendment, but it is not. It is Indian land, and we are striving to extinguish the title by purchase. We are proceeding in accordance with the precedents heretofore set by the Government.

No petition has been filed here in favor of such a proposition. Although substantially the same amendment was offered at the last session by my colleague from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON] and was voted down, I never heard of it in the campaign; and no petition has ever reached here asking for anything of this kind. What the Union soldiers of this country want is that this region of country shall be organized under a Territorial government; and they are willing, if they wish to settle upon it, to pay $1.25 per acre for the privilege, and are willing to share this land with the other good citizens of the country on equal terms.

I say the proposition is dishonoring to the soldiers of the Union, and places them in a false light before the world. These soldiers are not mendicants and beggars, nor do they wish to be favored in matters of this kind above their fellow-citizens. I repeat, such propositions are dishonoring to the Union soldier. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], in the first session of this Congress, pointed out very succinctly the objections to amendments of this character, and I have no doubt he is ready to repeat those objections this afternoon.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I owe it to the gentleman from Illinois to state that when I said I had submitted an amendment similar to this I did not catch the full drift of the amendment. I supposed it was the one with reference to section 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. I now see that I was in error. On hearing this amendment read, I find that it is in substance the same as that offered during the first session of this Congress, and advocated so vigorously by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON], who is not now in his seat.

Mr. Chairman, there is an important distinction here which the gentleman from Illinois, it seems, fails to observe. If these lands were now public lands, I should be with him on the proposition to extend the homestead laws over them. But they are not public lands; they are lands as to which the Government is proposing to purchase whatever right, title, and interest the Indians may have in them.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman, of course, desires to be accurate. I will, therefore, remind him that included within the terms of this bill is the Public Land Strip of three and a half million acres. That is public land to-day; and that the Union soldier is prohibited from going upon.

Mr. WARNER. That is true; there is that Public Land Strip. But the gentleman has been in Congress, lo, these many years, and the soldier has been prohibited from going upon it all the time.

Mr. PAYSON. Why?

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. That is but a small portion of the land intended to be embraced in the Territory of Oklahoma. The bill under consideration makes this provision in favor of the Union soldier. It says to the man who did not participate in the battles of his country, "You must live on the land three years before you can acquire a title."

A MEMBER. Five years.

Mr. WARNER. Three under this bill; five under the homestead law. It says to the man who fought the battles of his country, "You may go on this land and have all the benefits of section 2305; that is, your service in the Union Army or Navy as a set-off from the time you have to live on the land, but you must live on it one year." I would not have it, if I could, that the Union soldier could go there and acquire title without residence. I think one feature of opening the public domain is in opening it to actual settlement, to men who intend to make their homes there. I would make it as far as possible by legislation a home for the homeless; I would make it land for the landless.

Now, it is proposed to sell these lands to the man who shall settle on them at $1.25 an acre, payments in four equal installments running through a period of three years, $50 a year. It is virtually giving a home to the man who wants a home, in the center of the continent almost; it is giving him a home not in the unexplored West, but where railroads, the great arteries of commerce, gridiron it; it is giving him a home surrounded by markets for everything that the hand of man can produce.

Mr. HOOKER. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WARNER. Pardon me; in a moment. I do not impugn the motive of any gentleman offering amendments, nor am I authorized to speak for any man but myself, but I may say that I have some acquaintance with the wishes of the old soldiers of the country; no more presumably than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], nor do I arrogate it to myself; but never have I heard it claimed that such a provision should be put into this bill, a provision which to my mind, if not so intended, the result of which will be to defeat this measure on a vote in the House.

A MEMBER. Why should it do it?

Mr. WARNER. I believe the men who fought the battles of the country, the old soldiers we talk so much about, simply ask justice at the hands of Congress. They want legislation that shall apply to all. They are not here as beggars, and I hope to God they never will be. [Applause.] They ask no alms. They only demand absolute justice, and I hope the day will soon come for clapping of hands on each side of this Chamber, when the Government of the United States shall do equal and exact justice to the men who preserved this United States a nation, when adequate pension legislation will be enacted.

Mr. HOOKER. If this be the El Dorado you describe it to be, does not the gentleman from Missouri think it is a hard thing on the Indians that they should be compelled to sell their lands for such a small sum of money?

Mr. WARNER. It seems to me I am flanked on both sides by gentlemen who urge amendments in behalf of the old soldier. The gentleman [Mr. HOOKER] will vote for the amendment, as I think he voted the other day to give to the Union soldiers homes on these Indian lands, and will then vote against the bill. I submit the bill now gives to the Union soldiers the benefit of the time they served in the Army. They are waiting for the passage of this bill in every district in this land. These men are waiting and anxious for the opening of this territory. They are demanding it be opened, but no man has received a letter and no request has been made to ingraft on this bill any such provision as the one which has been indicated.

The same discrimination in favor of the Union soldier is made in this bill as in the homestead law for the public domain. Under the homestead law, the man who served in the Army or Navy pays as much for his land as the man who staid at home. Each gets his land by living upon it a certain period of time. The man who was not a soldier has to live on the land five years; the soldier has to live on the land five years, less his service in the Army, but he must reside on the land at least one year.

Under the provisions of this bill each pays the same price—$1.25 per acre. The citizen not having an honorable discharge must live three years on the land before he gets title; the soldier need only live on the land one year before getting title if he served two years in the Army.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to say that his amendment gives to the Union soldiers simply the same rights to these lands, if they shall become a part of the public domain, as they now enjoy with regard to the remainder of the public domain under the general land laws. Now, I have been somewhat surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, and thought I must have misapprehended his position. I wanted, therefore, to ask him whether he is opposed to that provision being inserted in this bill, giving to the Union soldiers the same rights on this land that they enjoy upon the other parts of the public domain?

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Michigan, I apprehend, sat here when we were treating for the Sioux reservation in Dakota, but I heard nothing from the gentleman from Michigan then upon the question suggested by this amendment. Nor did I hear the clarion voice of my friend from Illinois when my friend from Mississippi raised his voice in behalf of the Union soldiers of the country and demanded these rights.

Mr. PAYSON. Because I was not present.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I simply ask the gentleman from Missouri if he is opposed to granting the same rights upon these lands to the Union soldiers they have on other public lands?

Mr. WARNER. I am willing to assert my convictions here or elsewhere. I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to it in the interest of the soldiers, upon whose backs it is tacked and claimed to be in their interest. I believe these men, when this territory is opened, will be benefited by it. They do not want this measure killed by pretended friends. And, gentlemen, I say to you, take your course; but I stand upon the record as opposed to this amendment as a man who did some little of the fighting for this country and who has that right at least to speak as a soldier. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I take the floor in my own right. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he has not, since the last session of Congress, attended many soldiers' conventions, and whether——

Mr. WARNER. Just let me cut that question short——

Mr. SPRINGER. Whether he has ever heard any soldier making this demand?

Mr. WARNER. This is no place to bring in any convention, or its proceedings, that I have attended. It has nothing to do with the question, whether I have or have not. I am uttering my own sentiments, and speaking for no one but myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wanted to ask whether any soldier of the Union Army had ever asked for the incorporation of such an amendment.

Mr. WARNER. I am only giving my own views and opinions. I can only answer the gentleman by saying that none have asked me. What may have been said to other gentlemen I do not know. I opposed this amendment, or one similar, before the adjournment of Congress. I took the same position then that I take now. I have heard no complaint from any soldier.

Mr. PETERS. I concur in what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that both the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Illinois misapprehend the purport of the closing paragraph of the eighth section of this bill.

The closing paragraph of the eighth section preserves to the Union soldiers on these public lands, created by the organization of this Territory of Oklahoma, every single right they now have on any of the public lands of the United States. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois simply goes a step further and says that the Union soldier need not be a resident; that no residence by any Union soldier shall be required upon any of this land when the Territory is organized, and no payment for the land. That is the only difference, as I understand it, between the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois and the provisions of the eighth section of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman be kind enough to repeat that statement? I did not hear it in the confusion here.

Mr. PETERS. I say the only difference, as I understand it, between your amendment and the provisions of section 8 is that your amendment proposes that the Union soldier shall not be required to make any residence on the land in the Territory of Oklahoma, and shall have the lands without the payment of any money.

Mr. PAYSON. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that he is utterly mistaken. He does not grasp the fundamental idea of the amendment.

Mr. PETERS. Then it was because I was unable to comprehend what it does mean.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman be corrected?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. The amendment proposes to give to the Union soldier the right to take a homestead claim precisely as under existing law, and to mature that exactly as existing law allows and requires him to do. Section 2305 of the Statutes, to which the gentleman has incidentally referred, has reference only to the length of time that the Union soldier shall be compelled to live upon his claim to make good his title. This has nothing to do with initiating the title and taking the preliminary steps, for the general law fixes that. My amendment, therefore, gives him the right that he has under the existing law, which is all it contemplates, if I make myself understood.

Mr. PETERS. I understand the language that the gentleman has incorporated in his amendment; but the soldier has a right under this bill to make a homestead upon any part of the public domain of the United States covered by it.

Mr. PAYSON. Not under this bill.

Mr. PETERS. Under this bill when it passes. It gives that which is given him by the public-land law, and by this eighth section——

Mr. PAYSON. But let me interrupt the gentleman again. Does not this bill provide that these lands, except the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, shall be disposed of only by sale?

Mr. PETERS. Of course it makes provision for the sale of a certain portion of the lands to pay the Indians for their title.

Mr. PAYSON. Is that a homestead right under the provisions of the public-land law? My friend lives in Kansas, and he knows better than that.

Mr. PETERS. I stated that the gentleman's proposition was to allow the soldier to go and, irrespective of either residence or payment of any money, to take possession of these lands. Now, I am opposed to any such proposition as that, because that is what it means, and there is no use in disguising the fact. That is the purport of the gentleman's amendment. It must mean that if it means anything.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman from Kansas certainly does not mean to be misunderstood.

Mr. PETERS. I think I have made myself understood.

Mr. PAYSON. You say that under my amendment a man can make a homestead without settlement.

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman is wrong, because he can not have a homestead unless it is accompanied by settlement.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I served in the Union Army three years and six months, and according to the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois I would not be required to reside upon a quarter-section of Oklahoma country one moment, because I would be entitled to the credit of three years, having served three years and six months in the Army.

Mr. PAYSON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I set him right?

Mr. PETERS. I like to be set right.

Mr. PAYSON. Because the law provides in express terms that no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of one year prior to that. The gentleman is in error. He is in error in other things also, but especially in this.

Mr. PETERS. Your amendment provides that these soldiers shall have the right to go upon that land, and it provides also that they shall make no payment for it. Now, if that is your proposition, you do that very thing by this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Not at all.

Mr. PETERS. Undoubtedly. It says that the soldier shall have the right to deduct from his residence upon the land the amount of his service in the Army, but he shall be required to live upon it one year without making the payment under the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. Without making the payment.

Mr. PETERS. You do away with the payment.

Mr. PAYSON. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. I say I am opposed to doing away with the payment, and I will state my reasons in a very few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. If there be no objection, he will be allowed to proceed five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask that the amendment may be read. We seem to be talking rather blindly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] has the floor, and it will have to be read in his time.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PETERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois accomplishes anything, it simply does away with the requirement that the soldier shall pay this dollar and a quarter per acre. If I understand him, then I am opposed to that provision. I say I am opposed to that, in the first place, because the soldier does not ask for it. I am opposed to it, in the second place, because it does injustice to the soldiers who have settled upon the Osage Indian reservation, adjacent to this land. There is a reservation of the Osage Indians on the southern border of Kansas; and, under the law for the settlement of that reservation, every soldier who went upon it was required to pay a dollar and twenty-five cents per acre for the land. They have entered upon that land, put their improvements on it, put their labor into it, and by their enterprise and the hardships and fatigues of frontiersmen they have rendered more valuable the very lands which are now proposed to be opened by the amendment to all the soldiers in the United States.

The proposition, as is suggested to me, is in the nature of a tax upon those soldiers and sailors who have gone upon the Osage reservation for the benefit of those who may go upon the lands in the Oklahoma territory. I say the soldiers do not ask for it. They do not ask anything that is so unjust to their fellow-soldiers as a proposition of that kind. These very soldiers who have gone upon the Osage lands have by doing so made more valuable the lands contained in Oklahoma Territory. Now, there is another thing in connection with this. If there was a feeling in favor of anything of this kind it would have been disclosed by petitions, by resolutions of bodies, or by letters of individuals. I have the honor to represent a district which has a larger soldier population than any other district in the United States, and it is immediately adjacent to the land out of which the Territory of Oklahoma is proposed to be created, and yet never in all my experience as a member representing that district have I heard any claim from a single soldier of those 71,000 veterans in that district asking that this price shall be stricken from these lands when the territory shall be opened.

Mr. WEAVER. And all substantially are in favor of this bill.

Mr. PETERS. And they are in the main in favor of this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I doubt whether they have any knowledge about it.

Mr. PETERS. I will state further, that this bill and this proposition in relation to its occupancy by the soldiers have been largely discussed, and have entered into the politics of that district. While there is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of opening up this Territory in so far as its effect upon Kansas is concerned, there is no difference of opinion whatever upon the point in this bill that whenever this Territory shall be brought in, it shall be brought in under a provision of law that every man shall pay $1.25 an acre for the land. I say there never has been a difference of opinion in regard to that provision, and I have never heard until I heard it upon this floor to-day a single claim that this was pretended to have been asked for by any Union soldier that served during the late war.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have said that I doubted whether soldiers who are talked about so much here really understand the provisions of this bill at all. I admit that there is a great desire to have this territory opened. I have been inquired of by soldiers and by others who were not soldiers as to when it was to be opened, but in my own opinion they all believe that when it is opened it will be opened under the land laws of our country and subject to their provisions.

Mr. PAYSON. You are right about that.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. And while it is true as some gentlemen have intimated here, that Indian reservations have sometimes been disposed of by public sale, I think that generally when we have undertaken to organize Territories and extinguish Indian titles we have done it by bringing the land in as a part of our public domain, to be treated as all other public lands are treated; and I believe that the soldiers of this country will be greatly disappointed if, when this bill shall become law, if it shall become law in this form, they find that they are cut off from going upon these lands just as they can go upon any other public lands of the United States. And, Mr. Chairman, I do not understand why it is that a great body of public land, sufficient to organize a Territory and to have a Territorial government over it, should be disposed of in the manner in which it is proposed to dispose of this land. Where a small Indian reservation has become very valuable by reason of settlement surrounding it, it seems right and just that it should be made an exception to the general rule; but here is a new Territory with scarcely sufficient population to justify its being organized into a Territory at all, and I want to know why it is that this land is to be taken out from the operation of the general land laws in regard to settlements made by soldiers or by other citizens. It looks to me sometimes as if speculators had more to do with this bill than anybody else.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to answer the question of my colleague with regard to the reason for the provision contained in this bill, that settlers shall pay $1.25 for this land.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. That requirement applies to all the land in this entire territory, does it not?

Mr. SPRINGER. Except what is known as the Public Land Strip, which is public land, and is not incumbered with Indian titles. It does apply to the rest. There are six million acres in the Cherokee Outlet, and one million in Oklahoma proper, to which the provisions of this bill apply, or will apply. When that land is taken by a settler, whether a soldier or a citizen, he takes it under the homestead law and pays $1.25 an acre for it, in four annual installments. The reason for this provision is that that is the price we have to pay the Indians in order to acquire the land. This land is conceded by the bill to be Indian land, and wherever in the past we have purchased Indian lands we have required the settlers to reimburse the Government the amount it had to pay for the lands. I believe that has been the rule in every instance. It was done at the last session of Congress when we proposed to take, by agreement, 11,000,000 acres in the Great Sioux reservation in Dakota, paying 50 cents an acre for it. The bill provided that settlers going upon those lands should reimburse the Government for that outlay, and my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois] did not then speak about the necessity of having that bill amended so as to let Union soldiers take the lands for nothing, nor did it ever occur to any gentleman in this House that it was necessary to make such a reservation in behalf of the soldiers.

The same rule was observed in regard to the Indian reservations in Kansas around about where the Oklahoma reservation is; the settlers paid back to the Government the money which it paid to the Indians; and always when we have purchased lands from the Indians the settler, whether soldier or citizen, has had to reimburse the Government. We are proceeding, therefore, in this case just as we have proceeded in all others.

The gentleman [Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois] spoke about lands being taken in small bodies and settlers being properly required to pay for them because they were valuable. That was not a small body of land that we took in Dakota last session; it was 11,000,000 acres, a larger body than both of these tracts together, and the land was no more valuable than this. In fact, among all the lands taken from the Indians and sold to settlers there are not, and there never have been, any more valuable than those in Oklahoma, because those lands have been kept from settlement these many years, until a wall of civilization has arisen all around them. The Territory is within 60 miles of a city with 40,000 inhabitants and 80 miles of street railway, and in all the counties in the State of Kansas across the line from this Territory school-houses and churches abound, and civilization has done its perfect work.

The settlement of the other part is being retarded simply because cattle syndicates having possession of the Cherokee Strip have resisted every effort of the Government to purchase those lands of the Indians for the purpose of opening them to settlement; and the proposition now offered to this bill comes from those not in this House, but out of it, who are desirous of keeping this land for cattle syndicates as against the settler who desires to go upon it and occupy it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say that no Indian lands have been purchased by the Government—have entered into the public domain of the country and been subject to settlement just as other lands have—under homestead rights?

Mr. SPRINGER. Where we have acquired large areas of land by general treaties the case is different. But where we have purchased special tracts, as we propose to do in this case, the policy of the Government has been what I have stated.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. We purchased Louisiana, paying $16,000,000——

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course. That is just what I said.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. And we have purchased the Indian title to lands in many parts of the country, as I remember——

Mr. SPRINGER. That was where a great area of land was covered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Yes, a very considerable area.

Mr. SPRINGER. But here is a case where the Indians have a special claim to particular reservations, and when we have required this land——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I can not for my life see the distinction.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I can see this difference: that as to other bills which have been passed no friend or pretended friend of the soldier has risen on this floor and asked a special exemption in his behalf. It is a little suspicious, therefore, that these lands are to be excepted from the general policy of the Government and a reservation made in behalf of the soldier.

Now, I will state to my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], who offered this amendment, that since I have been a member of this House our pension-roll has increased from $29,000,000 to $85,000,000, and I have voted for every bill that helped to make this general increase of pensions to the soldiers of the country. I have endeavored to do justice to them under all circumstances, and will do so in the future. I believe I have as many soldiers in my district as any gentleman on this floor, and no one of them has ever asked me to have an exception of this kind made in his behalf. I know that the soldiers among my constituents are earnestly desirous of opening up this territory and do not ask for any special exemption in their favor. The people of all parts of the country are desirous that this territory shall be opened to settlement. I receive more letters on this subject than on all other questions of legislation before Congress. There is a feeling throughout the land in favor of the immediate opening of this region to settlement, and the only interest in that territory against it is the Cherokee Live-Stock Association, which has recently procured a renewal of its lease for five years, and wants to keep this land for cattle pasture, depriving the people of the opportunity to occupy it for homes.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I must confess to some surprise at some of the utterances which have been made here this afternoon, especially in view of the gentlemen from whom those utterances have come. It is well understood that in the public-land legislation of this country the honorably discharged Union soldiers have had, do have, and shall have certain preferences over those who do not occupy that relation to the Government. And why, when we are about to add to the public domain this last large body of land which we can thus add, except as we may take land now and then from the larger Indian reservations, we should reverse and go back upon the deliberate action of the Government in times past in relation to the Union soldiers, is something that I do not understand and for which no reason has been given here to-day.

It has been said here this afternoon by the chairman of the committee having charge of this bill [Mr. SPRINGER] that as we purchase this land at a certain price from the Indian tribes we must therefore recoup upon the actual settler and make him pay to the Government the same price that the Government pays to the Indians. Mr. Chairman, that is no reason at all, because there is not an acre or a foot of the public land that has not been acquired by purchase from somebody at some time. It matters not whether it was the Louisiana purchase acquired from France, or the Mexican purchase from the Republic of Mexico, or the lands ceded by the different Indian tribes. The price we pay in this case may be a trifle larger than the price we have paid in other cases, but the principle is precisely the same. We have never recognized the principle of recouping from the actual settler the price that we pay to the individual from whom we purchase the land.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that we adopted a correct principle of legislation when we recognized the Union soldier as a preferred settler upon the public lands. These men, who have suffered in the cause of the Government, who had given limb or health in sacrifice for the perpetuity of the nation, were recognized as entitled to have a preference from the Government in its policy with regard to the public lands. Why at this day should we reverse this principle which has run through our past legislation and which has given to this class of our citizens the preference they have had in respect to all the other public domain of the United States? For my part, I can conceive no reason for departing now from this well-settled principle. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois proposes simply to give to the Union soldiers the same preference in respect to this land that they have had in reference to other land. It proposes nothing more.

The gentleman from Kansas, in the opening of his remarks, claimed that section 8 of this bill gives to this class of citizens all the rights that would be given them by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. If that is so, why should he oppose the amendment?

Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is right, I believe it is just, I believe it is equitable, I believe it is according to the long-established and deliberately matured policy of this Government in regard to its public domain. So believing, instead of being a stop to this bill, as was said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], I say it should add to the support of the bill and give it votes on this floor.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In the event my colleague's amendment should be adopted, I ask the gentleman from Michigan whether he will heartily support this bill?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not know necessarily that I shall heartily support the bill. I will vote for it in the end.

Mr. CANNON. Will he do it without this amendment?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I prefer, of course, to vote for the bill with the amendment. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am in favor of opening up the country called Oklahoma to actual settlers. The only difference between myself and the chairman of the committee is this: I think this committee has got the cart before the horse instead of the horse before the cart. They are attempting to organize a Territory where there are no people competent for that purpose. They propose to organize a Territory without boundaries. It may have one boundary to-day and another to-morrow; the boundary would be a movable quantity as these various Indian tribes may accept the provisions of the bill.

As a bill it is, I think, sufficiently equitable. I prefer it with the amendment rather than without it.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether the advantage given to the Union soldier under the public-land laws now is not only in reference to the time of residence? Let us understand it. The man who was in the service in the five years' residence required to get title under the homestead law receives credit for the time he was in the service.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But must reside upon the land for one year.

Mr. WARNER. Yes; he must live for one year on the land. Is not that the only difference between the man who served and the man who did not serve?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. In this it makes the distinction, instead of under the land laws, where they are to get the land for nothing, that they are to pay to the Government $1.25 an acre. But at the same time the Union soldier is to get credit for the time he was in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Chairman, I had a desire to say something in the line of the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. SPRINGER]. When I gave way to the chairman of our committee on this subject I could not know that he would anticipate what I desired to say. I wish to add, the reason why the soldiers can not take up this land without the payment of money is this: The Government will have to pay for this land. It is incumbered more or less by law in part and by equity in part, and while under the homestead law the Union soldier may take up land without the payment of money and with reduction of time of residence according to his service, in order to free this land from the incumbrance which rests upon it the Government is compelled to pay for it to these Indians.

There is no law requiring the Government to offer these lands, which it has purchased, to certain claimants. The question now is, shall we, in addition to our system of pensions, bounties, and other privileges granted to our soldiers up to the present time, give them the privilege of purchasing homes for them in this Territory at the expense of the soldiers who have farms elsewhere in the country, who will have to contribute their share toward paying for them?

Now, that is one view of it. In this Territory there are three or four classes of land to which part of it, probably half of it, the soldier already has this right: that he can get his title simply by the payment of the homestead fees.

The question, then, is whether the soldiers shall have that privilege over and above the other people, and if they shall have it how are they to get the privilege? If you say that this is a special privilege to be granted to a soldier, is it to be reserved alone for him who applies first, or how is it to be done? Is it to be the one who first reaches the register's office and makes his application and entry? Is there to be a rush and a scramble for it?

It will open up, Mr. Chairman, innumerable difficulties if we ingraft such a provision as that proposed upon this bill; and so far as I know or have information from what has transpired here in the past, this bill is strictly in accord with other measures of a similar character enacted in the past twenty or twenty-five years, wherever lands have been purchased from the Indians.

And in regard to a remark made by a gentleman on the other side, I believe by the gentleman from Illinois, that he did not believe the soldiers understood this matter, permit me to say that in my region, at least since I have become, so to speak, identified with this bill, I have by letters and personal interviews been appealed to by several hundred men at least in regard to this bill, and all understand that they are to pay such an amount, not to exceed $1.25 per acre, as may be required to extinguish the Indian title, and are clamorous that the bill shall be enacted into a law so as to avail themselves of its privileges.

I believe this is all I desire to say.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, the opposition to this bill seems to come chiefly from two sources, and those are the special friends of the Indians, and those who are the special friends here lately of the soldiers.

Now, so far as I have been able to discover, the soldiers of the late war as a rule are in favor of the bill; and I believe it is the unanimous desire among the soldiers in my own State to have this territory opened for settlement and on the terms proposed in this bill. They do not believe that it is right to continue that portion of our country, so valuable in itself, longer unoccupied or to be used simply for droves of cattle and hunting-grounds for the Indians. We think it ought to be settled; and as there is some question as to whether it is the land of the Indians or not, or whether they have a title to it, we are willing that the matter shall be investigated and that they shall be paid at a rate of $1.25 per acre, or some such sum as may be given them for the use of their lands.

Now, in regard to the bill itself, permit me to say a word. It does not change the law of the public domain at all in regard to the organization of the Territory; and I wish to call the attention of the committee to this provision embodied in the eighth section of the bill in support of that statement:

Provided, That the provisions of section 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "Homesteads," shall not be modified or changed by anything in this act.

So it will be seen that all the public lands in this territory to be opened as a part of the public domain will be open to settlement by soldiers or by any one else under the provisions of the general homestead laws; and if they are not already purchased from the Indians, we simply provide that the Government of the United States shall not be at any expense, but that the money arising from the sale of the lands shall be used to reimburse the Indians for the lands.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman this question. The gentleman seems to assume that the Government of the United States is going to grant some privileges to the soldiers at the present time outside of the prevailing statutes as heretofore passed giving them certain rights on the public domain. I ask him why should a distinction or restriction be made as to this class of land that has not heretofore been made as to any other class of the public lands?

Mr. KERR. I will answer that question, that in regard to this particular tract of land it is already so favored that it is worth a good deal more than the lands formerly given to actual settlers on the frontiers. It was a great hardship in years gone by for men to go away out on the frontiers and settle on the public lands. The fact is that a man so settling paid more in hardship, privation, and distance from market than if he bought the lands nearer to some settlement and paid $5, $15, or $20 an acre. But these lands have already an advantage which is so manifest as to make them peculiarly valuable. They are surrounded by a country occupied and settled. They are near large cities and readily accessible by railroads.

Mr. HERMANN. Is that not true as to the public lands in nearly all the public-land States of the Union? Are they not surrounded by settlements? For instance, take Iowa and Minnesota.

Mr. KERR. There is not an acre of public land in Iowa.

Mr. HERMANN. Take Minnesota, for instance, and California and Oregon.

Mr. KERR. Nor is there an acre of public land in Minnesota.

Mr. HERMANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KERR. No, sir; not one. The Indian reservations, or the lands that have been taken from the Indian reservations by laws that have passed at this session and similar provisions heretofore passed, are the only public lands to be found there.

Mr. HERMANN. Then I refer the gentleman to the State of California and to Oregon. As a matter of fact I know that some of the richest lands in existence are in these States, and near some of the large towns and school-houses, and have all the conveniences of civilization surrounding them.

Mr. KERR. I do not know how that may be as to parts of California, but I know that some tracts of land in California, and in Oregon, are far distant from any settlements. There is plenty of land there that can not be given away. You can not get men to go on those public lands if you give them to them for nothing. Although they are anxious to get people to go there, they can not dispose of the lands.

But in case the lands are like these, surrounded by a cultivated territory, and lands worth $10 an acre, it is nothing but fair. In addition to that there is another point. I say if you open these public lands and open them so as to give them away to the first man who can get there, you will have five hundred thousand men in that Territory in less than six months, and a perfect war on your hands; but let them pay a little and there will be no such haste. Therefore I say as a matter of public policy we ought not to give these lands away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HOUK. I do not desire to make a speech. The whole objections to this amendment of my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] are untenable. The gentleman from Iowa says that the opposition to the bill seems to come from the particular friends of the Indian and the soldier.

A MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. HOUK. Well, I have overcome my——

Mr. KERR. I ought to have said the pretended friends of the soldier.

Mr. HOUK. I have overcome all my scruples on the Indian part of it. Here is a proposition to adjust the equities due to the Indians now in occupancy of this territory. The Government by this bill assumes to retake the territory; take it back as part of the public domain of the United States and make it a Territory. That being true, it does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that to deny that the principle of the homestead enactment is applicable within this new Territory when organized is to make an exception absolutely unjust to the Union soldier, for the benefit of whom the original homestead exemption was enacted. Now, as I understand it, the Union soldier can take advantage of the homestead law in Alaska and any of the Territories wherever public lands exist—everywhere except in that Territory which has been proclaimed as the garden spot of all the Territories of the country.

If this be true, you make a distinction and limit the rights of ex-Union soldiers. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be a piece of absolute class legislation to exclude them from the right now appertaining to other ex-Union soldiers in all the public lands of the country by making this distinction proposed in the bill and which is sought to be remedied by the amendment. One word further, because I had not intended to discuss this question. Public opinion is sustaining this bill. That public opinion grows out of the view that the Union soldiers of the country take of the provisions of this proposed enactment. Mark what I tell you. You pass this bill with this exception in it, without the provision proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON], and when the soldiers of this country hear that this distinction is sought to be drawn in this isolated instance, a different public opinion will gather in this country, and you will hear a noise hereafter from the ex-Federal soldiers that you will not want to hear.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman not know that this allows the soldiers to settle on the Government lands of this Territory?

Mr. HOUK. Exactly; but it requires them to do what they are not required to do in other places.

Mr. PAYSON. Let me correct the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], and also the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR], in saying that it does not permit the Union soldier to settle there.

Mr. KERR. I will call your attention to this provision——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. HOUK. I do not yield, except for a question.

Mr. KERR. If the gentleman will read the bill——

Mr. HOUK. I have read the bill. I am talking about the amendment. I want to vote for it, and I want everybody else to vote for it. I do not know whether I will vote for the bill without the amendment or not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that many of the suggestions that have been made upon the floor of this House show a very mistaken understanding of the situation that we find there in the Indian Territory. It is not public land. This bill does not propose to make it public land, and for that reason the provision of the law of which my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has spoken does not now and will not, by the provisions of this bill, apply to this land; but the gentleman proposes to make them apply to this land.

Now, this bill is drawn upon a different theory. It is drawn upon the theory that these are not public lands, but Indian lands, and the Government of the United States is to be made a trustee, so to speak, for the people who desire to go into that territory and make homes. The Government is to negotiate for those people with the Indians for the lands, and then when it has conducted the negotiations successfully and acquired the lands, the people who go in there and occupy them are simply to make good to the Government its expenditures while acting as trustee for them in securing the lands. That is the situation, and it is because of that situation that the soldiers of Kansas and the soldiers of the country generally have never asked that the homestead law should apply to these lands, because they are not public lands and it is not proposed to make them such. The bill simply recognizes the rights of the Indians and their equities in these lands and proposes that the Government shall conduct the negotiation, and then that the settlers shall pay to the Government the price which it has to pay to the Indians. To apply the amendment of my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to this bill would be to discriminate in favor of a few soldiers and against the great mass of the ex-soldiers of the Union Army. If we are to legislate for the soldier especially, let us provide that every Union soldier shall have a land-warrant.

If we are so exceedingly anxious about them, let us be fair and treat them all alike instead of discriminating in favor of a few Union soldiers who may happen to live upon the border of this territory. The friends of this bill are against the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] for the reason I have suggested, that these are not public lands and it is not proposed to make them public lands.

To my other friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON], who says that he is afraid that under the provisions of this bill these lands will be opened up to speculators, I will say that the amendment of his colleague [Mr. PAYSON] would aid speculators instead of deterring them, because after the soldier had lived on the land a year he could sell it to a speculator, so that in twelve months' time the land would be opened to speculation, whereas under the bill as it is no speculator can get a foothold in less than three years.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman assert that in good faith?

Mr. PERKINS. I do assert that in good faith.

Mr. PAYSON. Under the provisions of the bill, section 8, last clause, could not the soldier get his title at the end of one year?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Mr. PAYSON. The bill so provides in so many words.

Mr. PERKINS. But he would have to pay.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, but he could get his title; and then why could not he sell to the speculator?

Mr. PERKINS. Because the inducement to speculation could not be so great as if he could get title by one year's residence without the payment of any money. That is the reason.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, as we have almost reached the hour for adjournment, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BUTTERWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10614) to organize the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House stands adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BLANCHARD: A bill (H. R. 11782) to approve and ratify the construction by the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas Railroad Company of the bridge over the Red River at Shreveport, La., and the bridge over the Ouachita River at Monroe, La., and to authorize said railroad company to maintain said bridges over said water ways subject to certain stipulations and conditions—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11791) to remove the charge of desertion from Henry Miller—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BUTLER: A bill (H. R. 11792) for the relief of Newton C. Hartman—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CRAIN: Petition of John Superceky, of Corpus Christi, Tex., in relation to tariff on tin-plate—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DUNHAM: Resolutions of the Lumbermen's Exchange of Chicago, Ill., urging the early passage of the naval-reserve bill—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GROUT: Petition of N. W. Cody, for relief on account of money paid for a substitute in the late war—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HUNTER: Petition of John Sahan, for relief—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LEE: Papers in the claim of Anna M. M. Ramey, of King George County, Virginia—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LODGE: Petition of James Allen and 32 others, of West Bedford; of Isaac Mason and 69 others, of Worcester; of Willis Browning and 21 others, of Lynn; of E. G. Walker and 177 others, of Boston, and of Henry M. Phillips and 57 others, of Springfield, Mass., to grant to Robert Smalls a seat in the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Elections.

By Mr. McCLAMMY: Petition of William F. Atkinson and of Elizabeth Arnold, of North Carolina, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STONE, of Kentucky: Petition of G. B. Durham, for relief—to the Committee on Appropriations.

The following petitions against the passage of the international copyright bill were received, and severally referred to the Committee on Patents:

By Mr. BYNUM: Of Abner W. Ross, of Elwood, Ind.

Also, of W. E. Plackard, of Elwood, Ind.

By Mr. HARE: Of G. W. Coleman, of Henrietta, Tex.

By Mr. HAUGEN: Of E. F. Case, of Ellsworth, Wis.

By Mr. HOWARD: Of citizens of New Albany, Ind.

By Mr. McADOO: Of printers, electrotypers, and others of Jersey City, N. J.

By Mr. McKINLEY: Of Wallace H. Phelps, of Alliance, Ohio.

By Mr. E. J. TURNER: Of W. S. Chambers, of Stockton, Kans.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 14, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11794) to amend the postal laws of the United States in reference to letters bearing a special-delivery stamp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. ROGERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11793) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and to provide for writs of error in capital cases, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

COST OF COPIES OF PATENTS, ETC.

Mr. HEARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11796) to regulate the cost of copies of patents and other papers furnished from the Patent Office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting reports of contracts for carrying the mails, of mails established, of additional allowances to contractors, of curtailment of expenses, and of fines and deductions from the pay of contractors for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IMPROVEMENTS AT THE MOUTH OF CUMBERLAND RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a report from the Chief of Engineers, the report of a board of engineers relative to a plan for improving the mouth of Cumberland River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SAYERS, until Monday next, on account of sickness.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PARKER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3621) for the payment to the widow of the late Chief-Justice Morrison R. Waite the balance of a year's salary, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDING, KANSAS CITY.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 281) for the erection of a public building at Kansas City, Mo., and that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or acquire by condemnation proceedings, in accordance with the laws of Missouri, a suitable lot of land in the city of Kansas City, in the county of —— and State of Missouri, to be used for the construction thereon of a building suitable for the accommodation of the post-office, the courts of the United States, and all the other Government offices in said city, at a cost which shall not exceed for said site the sum of $250,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building, when constructed, unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys. And no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Missouri shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

"SEC. 2. That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purposes of the purchase of said site out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "An act to provide for the purchase of a site in Kansas City, Mo., for the erection of a public building thereon."

Mr. WARNER (interrupting the reading). I possibly may save time of the House by stating that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has reported the Senate bill back with an amendment, and I desire to have the bill passed as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk is now reading the proposed substitute.

The reading was resumed and concluded.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the gentleman will withhold that call until I can make an explanation of this measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] demands the regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for a moment.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, I think he will not object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think this Congress has already spent enough money in that direction.

DEATH OF HON. EDWARD W. ROBERTSON.

Mr. BLANCHARD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 19th day of January, 1889, at 3 o'clock p. m., be fixed as the time for delivering tributes to the memory of the late Hon. Edward W. Robertson, late Representative in this Congress from the State of Louisiana.

CITROUS WATER COMPANY, ARIZONA.

Mr. HUDD. I rise to submit a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7843) granting to Citrous Water Company right of way through Papago Indian reservation, in Maricopa County, Arizona, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

S. W. PEEL,
THOMAS R. HUDD,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. DAWES,
F. B. STOCKBRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. A rule of the House requires that the House managers in submitting a conference report shall submit also a written statement showing the effect of the action recommended. There is no such accompanying report in this case; but unless it is demanded the Chair will put the question on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. This seems to be an entire recession on the part of the House managers from the position taken by the House; they recommend a full concurrence with the amendments of the Senate. I think we had better know the effect of those amendments and the reason which has prompted the House managers to make this recommendation.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand that a written statement shall be submitted?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am perfectly willing that the statement be an oral one.

Mr. HUDD. The amendment placed on this bill by the Senate, and in which the House non-concurred for the purpose simply of getting the bill into conference that the subject might be more readily brought before the House, relates to the granting of the right of way to convey water across an Indian reservation in Arizona. The bill as it went from the House was not guarded in many respects, especially as to the rights of the Indians occupying the reservation to have free use of this water. The Senate amendment provides that this corporation while enjoying the right of way across the reservation shall allow to the Indians occupying the reservation the free use of the water. It is also provided that citizens of the United States who may have lands tributary to this right of way shall also have the right to use the water on terms to be agreed upon. There is also a reservation of the right of Congress to modify, change, or alter the provisions of this law as may be deemed necessary. Thus the rights of the people, and especially those of the Indians residing upon the reservation, are fully and effectually guarded.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. HUDD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOLIDAY ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has demanded the regular order.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to introduce a privileged resolution for reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the call of committees for reports be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having bills to report be permitted to hand them to the Clerk for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. SPINOLA. I object.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports of a private nature.

MARY THORN.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2861) granting a pension to Mary Thorn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHRISTIAN SANDERS.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11177) granting a pension to Christian Sanders; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELLEN SMITH.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2705) granting a pension to Ellen Smith; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. ELLEN HAND.

Mr. SPOONER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3264) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen Hand; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. D. HAWORTH.

Mr. SPOONER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3435) granting a pension to J. D. Haworth; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARTHA WINE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10920) granting a pension to Martha Wine; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH BODEN.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10901) granting a pension to Sarah Boden; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. GALLINGER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 10902) granting a pension to Melvina Greenya;

A bill (H. R. 10999) granting a pension to William H. Coffin;

A bill (H. R. 11200) granting a pension to Mary B. Peck;

A bill (H. R. 11260) granting a pension to Leonard Persons; and

A bill (H. R. 10560) granting an increase of pension to Charles Johnson.

CHARLES H. GREEN.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11354) granting a pension to Charles H. Green; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN PARKINSON.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3492) granting a pension to John Parkinson, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ELIZABETH CLOVER.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 11629) granting a pension to Elizabeth Clover; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROWLAND WARD.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11578) to increase the pension of Rowland Ward; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE BUCHANAN.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11043) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Catharine Buchanan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HARLAN E. KING.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11430) to increase the pension of Harlan E. King; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH A. CLEMENT.

Mr. LYNCH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 11411) granting a pension to Sarah A. Clement; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports is concluded.

RIFLE RANGE, MADISON BARRACKS, NEW YORK.

Mr. MAISH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9070) to provide for the purchase of land to be used as a rifle range and for other purposes in connection with Madison Barracks, New York; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned on Friday last a motion made by myself was pending, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar; and further, that all debate on section 6 of the pending bill (S. 1305) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua be limited to ten minutes. I now withdraw that motion and move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar; and further, that all general debate on section 6 and all amendments to the bill be limited to forty minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is the debate to be closed on the bill or on the section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the gentleman's motion if the House will come to order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar; and further, he moves that all debate on pending amendments to the bill under consideration and to section 6 of the bill be closed in forty minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The motion of the gentleman from Missouri as stated by the Chair not only limits the debate on this section, which was under consideration by the committee at the time it was last in session, but it limits the debate upon all amendments to the bill now pending or which may be hereafter offered. Now, there are certain paragraphs of the bill not yet reached or disposed of. There is this particular paragraph under consideration, for instance. Is it competent, then, for the House to order the closing of all debate upon all of the paragraphs of the bill when there is but one being considered?

The SPEAKER. Of course the present occupant of the chair can not have any official knowledge as to the exact status of the bill in Committee of the Whole. The Chair assumes, from the character of the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri, that the Committee of the Whole has reached the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not exactly the fact. It has not been reached in its regular order. There are amendments pending to several preceding sections.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment offered to the bill was proposed by the gentleman from Texas to the sixth section. Upon the adoption of that amendment, without objection, amendments to the preceding sections were offered and adopted. Afterwards my colleague [Mr. BLAND] offered a substitute for the sixth or last section, and upon the adoption of that substitute offered, without objection and by unanimous consent, for it could not have been done except by unanimous consent, a motion was made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] to amend the sixth section, and the motion was entertained by the Chair. I submit, therefore, sir, that upon the adoption of the amendment offered by my colleague it was not in order to move an amendment to any of the prior sections of the bill without unanimous consent, and if I be right in that position then the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia is not well taken. If I be wrong it follows that we have made no progress in the consideration of this bill, but that amendments and debate may go on ad infinitum.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri to say that a substitute had been offered to the sixth section of the bill and adopted, and that then the sixth section had been further amended upon the motion of another gentleman?

Mr. CLARDY. A substitute was offered for the sixth section and adopted, after which, I say, by unanimous consent, an amendment was offered to the second section, which was pending at the time the committee rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if that is the status of the bill in committee, the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is in order, for evidently the Committee of the Whole has reached the consideration of the sixth section.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, there was no request, permit me to state, for unanimous consent to offer the amendment to which the gentleman has referred. There was an irregular entertainment and consideration of motions and amendments to the bill in reference to these various paragraphs.

When the sixth section of the bill was under consideration the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asked of the then presiding officer if it would be competent for him to offer an amendment, I think, to the second section. The Chair answered that it would be, and accordingly the gentleman moved to amend one of the preceding sections. There was never any proposition or suggestion looking to unanimous consent. There was an irregular consideration of the bill, and amendments were entertained at various points, and, as I have stated, there was an irregular mode of procedure recognized by all without objection. The gentleman from Illinois never asked unanimous consent, but made the motion under instructions of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it makes any difference as to the question or order here presented whether the unanimous consent was asked or not. The material fact to be considered is this: Had the committee in fact reached the consideration of the sixth and last section of the bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. All I desire is that the Chair shall understand the fact as to the exact status in the committee; that these amendments were being considered without objection on the part of any one, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] says, were offered promiscuously to various paragraphs of the bill, and a number of them are pending now. Any construction of the action of the committee, therefore, that would lead the House to conclude that the committee had agreed to the preceding sections or to section 6 as an entirety is calculated to work a wrong to the committee, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that before the House shall be misled in any manner, or deprived of its rights of offering amendments all along the line of this bill, that the Chair will understand precisely the situation.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire simply to supplement the statement of the gentleman from Georgia as to what occurred, the present occupant of the chair not being familiar with what took place in the Committee of the Whole, by a statement which will be verified by an examination of the RECORD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], subsequent to the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], offered quite a lengthy amendment, which was adopted, to the first section of the bill. The order in which the different amendments were proposed and adopted, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY], is correct; but in addition an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to the first section of the bill. That, as I have said, was adopted. There was no unanimous consent in reference to that. Awhile after that an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], which was adopted, and then an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] subsequently to all of these to the first section of the bill, at which point I addressed an inquiry to the then occupant of the chair, asking whether it would be in order if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which was to insert a certain provision in a certain line of the bill, were adopted—it would then be in order for me to move to strike out the entire paragraph, and, if so, that I desired to be recognized for the purpose of moving that amendment. The then occupant of the chair said that it would be in order to do so, and would recognize me for that purpose. Other gentlemen sitting around me had amendments also to offer to the first, second, and third sections of the bill.

Now, the difficulty arising as to the parliamentary status of this bill results from the fact that the bill, as the RECORD will show, was never read in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amendment. The bill was called up and was considered generally; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] secured recognition, saying that he desired to offer an amendment to go into the sixth section of the bill, and after this a kind of guerrilla attack, or irregular consideration of proposed amendments, was the method pursued by the Committee of the Whole in its consideration of the bill.

There was no unanimous consent about it one way or another. It was considered in the way in which I have stated, and therefore it occurs to me—and I would say the point was made by some gentleman, whose name I do not recollect, about the time the deliberations in Committee of the Whole ended—whether it would not be proper in Committee of the Whole to have the bill read in the regular way, by sections, and have amendments offered by gentlemen who desired to offer them.

Nothing was done with that suggestion, as the committee rose. So it must be distinctly understood by the Speaker of the House that this bill has not been read by sections for the purpose of amendment, and gentlemen around me who have amendments to offer agree with me that it was not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Having been Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the last day on which this bill was considered, I will make a statement of the condition of the bill when the committee entered upon its consideration that day, and, as I conceive, the condition now. The bill was taken up before the adjournment last session on a Friday, and was called up under a rule then adopted for that day, allowing each member, when his name was called, to call up for consideration a bill, the consideration of which should be entered upon if a certain number of objections was not made. When this bill was reached, Mr. Speaker, there was some opposition manifested to it. Gentlemen who were desirous of getting it passed admitted amendments that were proposed to be offered to the respective sections to which they applied. They were offered and were considered irrespective of the section to which they belonged. There was great anxiety——

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let me get through with my statement, and I will with pleasure.

There seemed to be a great anxiety to, if possible, accommodate the gentlemen who had amendments to propose and to get the bill through on that day. In that condition of things there were a number of amendments offered. One was adopted, and if I remember, one was not acted upon; the former to section 5, the latter to section 2, and the bill went over, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived. When I was called to the chair in Committee of the Whole last Friday I found that the situation—amendments being offered to the bill and considered without regard to the section to which they applied. I suggested to one or two gentlemen who came to me while in the chair that that was irregular, and that we had better enter upon it in a more regular way. But no objection was made on the floor, and hence I could not make the point of order myself.

An amendment was offered to a section, and pending the amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asked if he would have the right after that amendment had been adopted to move to strike out the section, if I remember correctly. The Chair replied that he would. Hence, from the beginning there was little regard paid to the order in which the amendments were offered, and, as has been stated, after the amendment had been adopted to section 5 on the first day without objection, no objection further being made, there was a recognition of gentlemen to offer amendments to a section before that—the second section. This is a history of the proceeding in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not true, in addition to what he has stated, that after the committee rose on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY], that gentleman made the motion he now makes, and Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, being in the chair, was called upon to rule, and did rule, and sustained the point of order that I now make, and in pursuance of that the House was taking the vote upon limiting debate upon a single amendment and amendments thereto.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am inclined to think there was such a ruling. I will say that——

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the ruling.

Mr. DUNN. I desire to call attention to another state of facts. This bill has rather an anomalous position. It never belonged to the Committee of the Whole House at all. Had it been reached on the Private Calendar in a regular way it would have been considered in the House, and the previous question could at any time have been ordered upon the bill as an entirety. It comes to be unfinished business in Committee of the Whole because of a peculiar rule adopted during the last days of the last session of Congress—that is, that when in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar the alphabetical list of members should be called, and each member as his name was called be permitted to call up a bill. So that is why it was called up in Committee of the Whole. Now, having got into Committee of the Whole and being unfinished business, it must be disposed of. But the House can take possession of it, and apply the rules properly to it. The sixth section having been reached, or the last section of the bill having been amended, it is perfectly clear that all other forms were waived, and we offered the motion to dispose of the bill by closing debate on the amendments. There is no proposition here to cut off amendment. The proposition is simply to close debate on the bill and on pending amendments. The first reading of the bill had been waived. The right to take it up section by section in the Committee of the Whole was waived when the committee went to the last section of the bill; and now it is perfectly in the power of the House to take charge of the whole question and get this bill out of the way.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, there was considerable irregularity the day this bill was up last in regard to the manner in which it should be considered. The bill was not read through except as a part of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. He asked to have the bill read and it was embodied in his five-minute speech. After that it was taken up promiscuously and amendments were offered to various sections, apparently without objection on the part of any one, but it was never supposed by any of the members on this floor that the consideration of the first section had been closed, because it had not been read as a separate section. I had several amendments which I desired to offer to that section and which were on my desk at the time ready to be offered, but another amendment came from the other side of the House and it was considered by a sort of general consent, the bill never having been read through by sections nor as a whole, except, as I have already said, as a part of the speech of the gentleman from Indiana.

Now, to undertake to treat the first and second sections as disposed of is simply to deprive members of an opportunity to offer suitable and proper amendments to that part of the bill, and I trust that the friends of this measure will not undertake to apply any gag of that character. If they do, I do not think it will expedite their measure at all. What we want is a fair and honest discussion of this bill upon its merits.

Mr. DUNN. Are you willing to fix a time for a vote upon the bill?

Mr. SPINOLA. If you can reach a vote in a proper way, I have no objection to your passing this bill; but unless it is taken up in proper form, without any gentleman upon this floor being gagged, either as to offering amendments or discussing the merits of the bill, the question assumes another character. This bill is before the House irregularly anyhow. It did not come up as the unfinished business of the committee. It was taken up at another time and not while reports from that committee were entitled to consideration. It came up by unanimous consent late one afternoon, and was considered simply because there were not five objections made to it on that day. No gentleman on the floor of this House, I care not who he may be, nor how great may be his power of condensing his remarks, can begin to discuss all the merits of this question before this House in forty minutes, or in eighty minutes. This is one of the most important questions which have been before this Congress. The bill is an old stager here. It has been before many other Congresses. It has been kicked repeatedly, and now its promoters come back again and present it in another form. Heretofore they asked that the Government should become responsible for the payment of the interest on their bonds. They have dilly-dallied with it session after session, until now we find it here before the House in this irregular manner. It has no business here under the circumstances, and not one single section of it has thus far been read as a separate section so as to give an opportunity for members to offer amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I think I see a way out of this difficulty which will be satisfactory to all. As one who is in favor of the project of digging this canal, though not in favor of all the provisions contained in the bill, I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] asks that the resolution offered by him be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill incorporating the Nicaragua Canal Company, the bill be read by sections for amendment, and that the debate on the first section and amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. I can see no reasonable objection to that proposition, Mr. Speaker, and I think it should be satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. SPINOLA. Make the debate an hour on the first section.

Mr. PAYSON. The first section is not a very important one and ought not to occupy so much time.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in relation to this matter. I read from the proceedings of Friday last:

Mr. CLARDY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of Senate bill 1305, and pending that motion I move that all debate on the bill and amendments be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, can that motion be made as to the whole bill? It seems to me it should be confined to some particular section of the bill. It can not apply to any portion of the bill which has not already been the subject of amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. I suggest to the gentleman that when by unanimous consent we have been considering this bill in a general way it is too late now to raise the point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think there has been no consent upon the subject except, I presume, by acquiescence. There has been no express consent. No consent has been asked or obtained except by implication.

Mr. CLARDY. The section under consideration is the last section, at any rate.

Mr. SPINOLA. Not by any means.

Mr. PAYSON. There is pending an amendment to the second section.

Mr. SPINOLA. And quite a number of amendments are yet to be offered to the first section.

Mr. CLARDY. We recurred to the second section by unanimous consent.

Mr. DUNN. In order to adjust matters, I hope——

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to hearing suggestions, but I trust I shall be allowed to continue.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that under our rules when a bill contains a number of sections and is considered in an informal way, as this bill has been, different portions having been under consideration and made the subject of amendment, the true mode of procedure after all is for the gentleman having charge of the bill to move to close debate on successive sections. Certainly debate could not be closed in this way upon the whole bill.

Mr. CLARDY. I make my motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not conceive how it can be in order under our rules to move to close debate on the whole bill. The rule contemplates simply that the gentleman in charge of a bill may have the right to move to close debate on a given amendment or on a given paragraph and amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to move, pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, that debate be limited to twenty minutes on the pending section.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood differently.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Missouri sought to have his motion apply to the whole bill.

Mr. CLARDY. I did not hear the statement just made by the Chair.

Mr. BLOUNT. As the gentleman from Missouri did not hear the statement, I will take the liberty of saying that, according to the understanding of the Chair, the gentleman from Missouri moved to limit debate to twenty minutes upon only a single section of the bill.

Mr. CLARDY. In my motion I embraced the entire bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would indicate to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] that in the opinion of the Chair it is hardly in order now to move to limit debate upon the entire bill.

Mr. CLARDY. I move, then, to close debate—upon what section were we engaged?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The second section is the one to which the pending amendment relates.

Mr. CLARDY. I move that all debate on the second section and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. CLARDY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to withdraw my motion; but I wish to hear again the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] asks that the proposition made by the gentleman from Illinois be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill incorporating the Nicaragua Canal Company, the bill be read by sections for amendment and that debate on the first section and amendments thereto be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. CLARDY. I suggest that the gentleman say "ten minutes."

Mr. PAYSON. I will compromise the matter and say "twenty minutes."

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri can not take another gentleman off the floor by a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman from Illinois apprehend that that motion will do away with amendments already ingrafted on the bill?

Mr. PAYSON. Oh, no; not at all.

The SPEAKER. It will not affect them in the least. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] withdraws his original motion and accepts the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois modified so as to say twenty minutes instead of thirty minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, on the adoption of that proposition I demand the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota, addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. On a matter touching this very subject I rise to a question of privilege, and would like to be heard before this proposition is voted upon.

Mr. PAYSON. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read certain passages I have marked in the New York Herald of the 13th instant.

The Clerk read as follows:

Two elements have united in the House to make the pending bill incorporating the Nicaragua Canal Company a failure. They are the agents of the Pacific railroads and the attorneys of the Panama Canal Company. The amendments already added to the bill make it worthless. As it came from the Senate the bill was not altogether as fair to the enterprise as it was expected it would be, but its present condition, as Judge Daly said in to-day's Herald, makes it of no use to any one.

During the debate last Friday Mr. DINGLEY, of Maine, whose integrity no one questions, openly declared on the floor of the House that it seemed to him that there was a settled purpose on the part of some gentlemen to defeat it in an indirect way. While admitting the importance of the object sought, it was at the same time the real purpose to defeat the bill.

* * * * * * *

PACIFIC ROAD INTEREST.

Somewhere about the Capitol locked up in the desk of a Congressman might be found the following memorandum from an attorney of the Pacific Railroad who practices about the Capitol:

"Pacific road opposes the measure because it would practically end its business as a common carrier, especially along the southern route. See that amendments are so framed as to have the appearance of protecting the Government, while they render the act inoperative. Your cue in debate is to give the Panama route the devil. Insist that Nicaragua route is the only practical route, but any act of Congress must avoid committing the United States Government, by inference in the slightest degree, to fostering the measure."

An examination of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since the Nicaragua bill has been under consideration discovers the unanimity with which a large number of patriots have put themselves on record and whose whole argument is but a repetition of this useful "mem" suggestion how to effectually but covertly kill the bill.

The three tampering amendments, which Judge Daly says make the bill useless, were offered by Mr. BLAND of Missouri, Mr. WILSON of Minnesota, and Mr. COBB of Alabama.

* * * * * * *

PAYMENT OF STOCK.

The third amendment was offered by the greatest alleged friend the scheme could possibly have—Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That means "of Minnesota."

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That no certificates of stock shall be issued until at least 10 per cent. of the same shall be fully paid for in money at the par value of said stock and the money deposited in the treasury of said company, and said stock so subscribed shall not be assignable until the whole of the same shall be paid in, and no payment on account of capital of said company shall be made except in money; and said company is hereby prohibited from returning or rebating any part of the money so paid. No bonds in excess of the amount of capital paid and received shall be authorized or issued until such paid capital shall amount to the sum of $5,000,000. No part of the capital stock paid in shall be at any time withdrawn or returned to the stockholders or in any manner diverted from the proper uses of the corporation. Every person violating or aiding in the violation of the foregoing provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of such punishments in the discretion of the court."

Worthless as the bill now is with all these disinterested and patriotic amendments grafted on it, it is still to be further amended, each friend of the Panama Canal Company and the Pacific Railroad Companies being determined to prove his fealty to the "commune" by his desire to see this great maritime highway built under a charter with a little amendment tacked on that is deemed necessary to save the honor of the country.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am not usually very sensitive about any attack upon me. I believe this is the first time in my life that I have ever called attention in a legislative body to any insinuation of this kind. Up to the time when I saw this interview, Mr. Speaker, I believed the promoters and incorporators of this Nicaragua Canal to be honest men, intending patriotically to forward the building of a canal that would, as I believe, be to our country a great and valuable public improvement. I have talked to those men personally about this matter, and especially to Judge Daly, and if there be any persons about this House opposing the measure I have held no communication with them, nor do I know one of them. I conversed with Judge Daly, as I have said, about this matter, and I told him I desired this amendment.

Mr. Speaker, when the language of this amendment is examined and understoood it will be seen that its sole purpose is to prevent the issuance of stock without consideration. The issuance of such stock is a fraud on every honest stockholder. Not only that, sir; it is a fraud on all the patrons of the improvement and on the people at large.

This amendment was framed in the interest of the public and to prevent a dishonest practice that has of late become common and most injuriously affected the interests of the whole people.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will permit me to ask whether Judge Daly, to whom he refers, is one of the promoters of this bill?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I believe he has been one of the most prominent promoters. He has been several times before the Committee on Commerce touching this matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is he the author of this article?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I think it may be inferred that he is either the author or the instigator.

Mr. DAVIS. I think not.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I know nothing of the authorship except so far as it may be inferred from the article itself. Whoever the author may be, he says that I am an "alleged friend" of the enterprise, and insinuates that I and other gentlemen named are not only enemies of this enterprise, but tools or dupes of the Pacific Railroad or of the Panama Canal Company. The sole and only basis for this charge is (so far as I am concerned) that I have had the audacity, without permission, to offer an amendment tending to prevent any fraud on either the honest stockholders or the public, and which prevents men from issuing stock to themselves without the payment of a dollar in aid of the enterprise.

No one dares to defend that which is forbidden by this amendment. That the thing forbidden is a fraud on both the stockholder and the public every one knows; that it has been long common is equally notorious. If the parties controlling this enterprise do not propose to issue watered or unpaid-for stock, the amendment is simply unnecessary, and so far as they are concerned, inoperative and harmless. But who will deny that this outcry against such an amendment does not clearly show its necessity? These charges have not a shadow of foundation in fact.

Mr. COX. Allow me, right there. This does not come from Judge Daly.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. If it does not come from Judge Daly it comes from somebody else.

Mr. COX. I ask to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, before I yield the floor to anybody, that the man who suggested or caused that article to be written, whoever he may be, seems to be trying to drive the members of this House to consent to a charter so loose in its provisions that it will allow certain men to collect tribute from the company without paying a dollar into the enterprise.

I wish to say that this amendment offered by me was sanctioned by Governor DINGLEY, of Maine, and by the best friends of the enterprise on this floor. There is nobody who is more in favor of this enterprise than myself, but I am opposed to watered stock or dishonest stock, issued without any consideration, and I am also opposed to a charter so loosely framed as to admit of the issue of such stock. And I believe that the amendment which I offered and this committee adopted will strengthen the enterprise and give assurance to honest investors and to real friends of the enterprise.

Messrs. COX, BLAND, and SPINOLA rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota rose to a question of privilege and has made his statement. He presented no matter for debate.

Mr. SPINOLA. I wish to rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. PAYSON. I rise for the purpose of a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. My point is whether or not the article as read from the Clerk's desk presents a question of privilege? Much as I dislike to interfere with any gentleman to make any explanation he deems proper——

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Illinois would save time if he would permit members to go on.

Mr. PAYSON. There need be no feeling about this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the article read by the Clerk at the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota presents any question of privilege under the rules of the House. It may present such matter as entitles the gentleman to the ordinary courtesy of making a personal explanation. The Chair thinks that under Rule IX of the House this is not strictly a question of privilege, because there is no charge of corruption or misconduct on the part of any member in his representative capacity.

Mr. BLAND. I think the House itself has been liberal in reference to questions of personal privilege.

Mr. PAYSON. My poirt is, is this not a question of personal privilege?

Mr. BLAND. But the House has been liberal in extending the courtesy to members of making personal explanations in reference to matters of this character, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not undertake to cut off such explanations.

Mr. PAYSON. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. BLAND. I do not wish to detain the House at any length and would not have said a word on this floor except for the fact that this article has been read here. I know nothing about the company which has originated this bill, and I know nothing about the opposition to it outside of this Hall. The amendment I offered to that bill, and which was adopted by the House, was intended to secure the power of Congress over this corporation. Now, when this correspondent refers to the fact that Jay Gould and Vanderbilt and some of those gentlemen to whom Congress has granted great franchises, and by which they have accumulated enormous wealth from extravagant and ill-advised legislation, that they are in opposition to this scheme, they had better bring some evidence of that fact. If I were to judge of this bill and the manner in which it is being urged by that correspondent and parties interested I would suppose they were the same old schemers who got control of the Pacific Railroads, control of Congress which failed to preserve the power of legislation over it; that they are the same old schemers who are here to-day to secure the monopoly of this isthmus, so as to control, in addition to the railway routes, the great water channels of commerce, so as to control the great international commerce of the country.

I have been a friend of this measure so far as the main objects of it are concerned if it could be made in the interest of the people of this country and if the power of the Government could be reserved over it. But, sir, if it is to be hounded through here by men who undertake to vilify and slander members on this floor who seek to do their duty to the people of this country, I am forced to the conclusion that corrupt motives are underlying it at the bottom on the part of the corporators and their overzealous correspondents, and it will never get through this body with my consent unless with the amendments incorporated upon it and others of a similar character which will make it safe and right for the people of the country; and gentlemen may look well to the bill in that regard.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the demand for the previous question——

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask the gentleman to withhold that for a moment.

Mr. PAYSON. How long?

Mr. DUNHAM. All day, if you insist upon it.

Mr. SPINOLA. I shall only occupy a few minutes' time.

Questions of privilege of a personal character are something I have not indulged in, nor have I taken advantage of any occasion by rising in any public body of which I have been a member and asking to be heard. But, Mr. Speaker, when the entire Congress of the United States—on that side, at least—which feels it to be a high public duty to the people of this country, on the floor of this House, to perfect a great public measure by proper amendments, is to be assailed and insulted, even charged directly with dishonesty for their action, it then becomes my duty, as I think it is the duty of every other member, to meet that issue upon the floor of the House, or wherever it is raised, and set the wrong right.

Now, sir, the article which has been presented and read from the New York Herald by the gentleman from Minnesota was based upon an interview with Judge Daly, or ex-Judge Daly, with the New York Herald man the day previous. Ex-Judge Daly is one of the principal gentlemen who are behind this measure.

Since his retirement from the bench by reason of the limitation of age he has been directing his great ability and learning in the direction of carrying through enterprises of a similar character and has brought forward his energies for the support of various measures before the New York Legislature. Now I find him here before the Congress of the United States, and I may say that all of these measures in which this high-toned gentleman has been associated since his retirement from the bench have been of a very doubtful and of a very greasy character. [Laughter.]

Mr. SOWDEN. Is he a lobbyist?

Mr. SPINOLA. I am asked if he is a lobbyist. That is a question for the House of Representatives and not for me, to say whether he is or not.

A gentleman who hangs about the doors of legislative bodie simportuning members to vote for measures of which he has charge would usually come under the head of a lobbyist, I believe; but any gentleman on the floor of the House is as capable of judging of that matter as I am. I shall make no improper charges against ex-Judge Daly. I would make none, for I have known him as a boy. We were boys together. We ran with the same old engine together and worked upon the same brake at the fires.

I saw him go upon the bench in 1842 by appointment under Governor Bouck, of our State, and I saw him occupy that position by the suffrages of the people when it became an elective office by the votes of all political parties, because he was a fair and an impartial judge, until his retirement from the bench by reason of age. Since then we find that he has been engaged in enterprises of this character and has become——

Mr. WEAVER. Become "greasy" since that? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPINOLA. No, sir; I did not say that. I do not say that he is "greasy," or has become so. I say that the enterprises with which he has been connected have a greasy character. The under-ground railway under Broadway, which was an old scheme before the Legislature of New York for almost a quarter of a century, turns up with new blood injected into its veins, and that new blood is led by my old friend and associate, Judge Daly.

Mr. RAYNER. How about the over-ground railroad?

Mr. SPINOLA. They have had their day of settlement in the courts. Those questions have all been considered.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But they have been engaged in fighting the under-ground; have they not?

Mr. DUNN. And all were "greasy?"

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, of course; every one of them.

Mr. RAYNER. How about the surface roads?

Mr. SPINOLA. The Broadway surface scheme was as greasy as any of them. [Laughter.]

Now I stand here to say that what has been read from the article in the New York Herald of the date given to-day, and one of a preceding date, the 12th instant, indicates merely the same old scheme to trap the unwary, a sort of "bunco game" to drive the House into the passage of this bill. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. A "bunco game?"

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes; I say a bunco game.

Mr. DUNHAM. Please explain that. What is a bunco game? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAYNER. Yes; let us know what that means in New York.

Mr. SPINOLA. A bunco game is a sort of mysterious game that is played by certain sharpers to filch honest people out of their money. [Laughter.] That is what a bunco game is as interpreted in the city of New York by the police courts there. It is a kind of gudgeon used as bait to entrap the greenhorns. And "Hungry Joe," let me inform my friend from Baltimore, one of the very worst of the whole lot, has recently been taken back to Baltimore by a requisition from that State. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RAYNER. Oh, no; "Hungry Joe" is one of your own productions. We do not want him. You would not give him up when we did want him.

Mr. SPINOLA. We made New York so hot for "Joe" that he had to get out, and he went down to Maryland and captured a fresh fish down there for $5,000 [great laughter], and your governor made requisition to get him because they wanted him badly.

Mr. RAYNER. But your governor would not let us have him. You refused to give him up.

Mr. SPINOLA. Oh, yes, he will give him up. We have sent him down to you already. He has gone down to "fresh fields and pastures green." [Renewed laughter.] He will be down there hunting for new bait to trap the unwary, and I hope sincerely that you will keep him there for our sake. [Renewed laughter.] I hope you will keep him there for the sake of verdant men all over the country who visit the great city of New York. It may be possible that he will turn up here in Washington, for all we know, and some gentleman on the floor of the House may become his victim; and I hope none of the members of this House will become the victims of this "greasy enterprise" which is now under consideration.

A MEMBER. Will you not vote for the bill?

Mr. SPINOLA. Well, sir, when the bill comes up on its final passage, I will say whether I will vote for it. I want it perfected; I want it made safe to the United States, and that the country shall be protected in every way.

Now, sir, what is the condition of this bill? The gentleman proposes to limit debate to forty minutes on the amendments to the bill.

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. The point of order I make is that the gentleman is not speaking to a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order to discuss the merits of the bill, because the bill is in Committee of the Whole and not in the House.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will discuss one matter made by President Cheney, who is the president of one of the banks of New York, and is one of the parties interested in this measure, in conjunction with Judge Daly. He says:

> I do not think we should hold Congress responsible for the attitude of three or four obstructionists there.

Those who know these gentlemen need no explanation as to what that means.

There is an inference that the opponents of this measure, or those who desire to perfect it and make it a suitable bill, are governed by improper influences. Has it come to this, sir, that on the floor of the American Congress a Representative can not express his opinion, or can not declare his opposition to a measure, without having his motives impugned?

Why, sir, if they will give us time to discuss this bill, we will make the friends of it ashamed of it before we get through. I am satisfied, from the facts here to-day, there is enough to deter every man who has regard for the character of this House from voting for this bill when the time comes.

Now, sir, I have nothing further to say in regard to that point at this time. But I will ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] whether he will not agree that debate on the first section of this bill shall be limited to one hour, half of the time on each side?

Mr. PAYSON. I am content with that.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask that in all honesty and fairness, because the first section is the most important one in the bill. It embodies everything. It embodies the amount of stock the company shall have and the amount of bonds it shall issue.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. Nothing. [Loud laughter.]

Mr. SPINOLA. I would move, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, to limit the time for debate on the first section to one hour—half an hour on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question on his motion.

Mr. SPINOLA. I understood the gentleman to withdraw it for the purpose of permitting me to make the motion I have stated.

Mr. WEAVER. I want to ask that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] be heard.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] to give me a few moments. I think it is due to the character of Judge Daly——

Mr. COBB. I ask if the gentleman will not also allow me a minute?

Mr. COX. I would yield to the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. COBB. I would only take a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] rises before the gentleman from New York begins his remarks and asks the same privilege.

Mr. FARQUHAR and others. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. That cuts all this off.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois did give his assent, but the regular order is demanded by several gentlemen.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Alabama was mentioned in that paper, and inasmuch as he was, I think he should be heard.

Mr. COX. I would not take the floor from the gentleman from Alabama if he were at all inculpated in the remotest degree in the interview published in the Herald, which I think is wrongly attributed to Judge Daly.

The SPEAKER. Is the regular order demanded?

Mr. PAYSON. I do not demand it at this time.

Mr. COBB. I do not know that it is necessary at all that I should say anything, and would not do it but for the fact that other gentlemen whose names have been mentioned by the correspondent referred to have been heard before the House.

A MEMBER. I hope we shall have order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made every effort to secure order on the floor. Gentlemen will cease conversation, so that the gentleman from Alabama can be heard.

Mr. COBB. The article referred to in the New York Herald that has just been read mentions my name in connection with those of other gentlemen who opposed the measure that was pending the other day, known as this Nicaragua scheme. The article does not charge in so many words that we were corrupt, but it contains the intimation that every gentleman on this floor who was opposed to the bill incorporating this company is actuated by an improper motive. In other words, it charges that there is a lobby about the doors of this Congress that is seeking to influence every one of us in the interest of another and opposing scheme.

Now, I simply desire to state, so far as I am concerned, that I never heard of that conflicting interest until I saw mention of it in this correspondence. No man ever mentioned it to me before. I never was approached directly or indirectly about it, and I hope it is unnecessary for me to say that such an approach as that would have been unavailing. I care nothing about the little fling in the article against myself. I would not have noticed it upon the floor of Congress in this way but for the reason that I have given. There is unquestionably contained in it an intimation that we were unduly influenced, and as other gentlemen have seen proper to denounce it, I desire simply to unite with them in the denunciation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced hat the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, disagreed to by the House; agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. MANDERSON, and Mr. COCKRELL.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would freely and cheerfully join in any kind of malediction upon any interviewer who would endeavor to bring reproach upon the character of men like the gentlemen from Alabama [Mr. COBB], from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON], or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], or any other of the gentlemen who stand here endeavoring to secure honest legislation and to perfect this bill by amendments which in their judgment are wise and proper. Whoever may be the man who undertakes in the Herald or elsewhere in any way to smirch those gentlemen deserves the reprobation of good men everywhere. But when it is undertaken here to fix upon my friend and neighbor, Chief-Justice Daly, any odium in connection with the pending measure or this Herald interview and these charges it is impossible for me to sit still. I must repel any accusations or imputations against him. He is a gentleman who stands far higher than ordinary men in public or private life. He has been connected for nearly forty years with the administration of justice in the city of New York as chief-justice of the court of common pleas. To this office he has been elected and re-elected unanimously, amid all the vicissitudes of New York political and judicial life. The ermine is not less pure——

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. COX. Not now.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to know whether Judge Daly has ever disavowed this interview, because my judgment about him would depend a great deal upon whether he stands by the interview or disavows it.

Mr. CLARDY. I will say to my colleague that the offensive matter complained of by gentlemen is not in Judge Daly's interview.

Mr. COX. I can not answer the gentleman's question. Judge Daly has not been in this city since this session of Congress began. He appeared before the Senate committee, and before the House committee, at its request, as the attorney for those engaged in this Nicaragua enterprise. He appeared to argue the legal and international propositions, and to present the matter, geographical and topographical, properly to Congress through its committees.

He is the honored president of the United States Geographical Society. He is a man of large experience and vast learning and accurate knowledge in connection with all the various commercial enterprises on the face of our star. He is a man who stands irreproachable in New York and wherever he is known; and no peculiar patois, drawn from a peculiar class of people in New York City, can for one moment fix a stain upon his elevated character. Sir, he did present this matter to Congress, and, Mr. Speaker, I sometimes wish that we had here the system that prevails in and around the English Parliament. There parliamentary lawyers are allowed and licensed to present matters for legislation before committees. Would it not be well to have that system here? Then men who come here for the Federal protection of their laudable enterprises at home or abroad may choose men of experience, learning, knowledge, and skill—legal and otherwise—to present their matters, and thus relieve us of much research and labor, and add to our own much-needed information. Let us avail ourselves of such valuable services, thus saving time and giving principles, facts, and sometimes inspiration to Congress on matters of magnitude, like the present project. It does not follow that that class of men should be derided as "lobbyists." When we have more of such men around Congress we shall have fewer lobbyists. We shall not have the Albany system transferred to Washington. [Applause.] I have served here for thirty years, and, thank God, I have never yet seen the system which exists at Albany brought into use in Washington except in one or two instances. That system does not belong here. It can not live in the sunlight of Washington City; and even the language used by the men who are more or less engaged in that kind of business and are experts in it can not be understood by the representatives of the American people, who are represented at its Federal capital by intelligent men who understand what refinement and courtesy mean.

I therefore think it my duty, as it is my pleasure, as a member from the metropolis, to say this much in regard to Judge Daly. I would add that in my judgment and so far as I know there has not been a particle of undue influence used to forward the passage of the present measure. By the action of our Government, by our naval officers, our engineers, by our men of means and character, skill and experience, information has been given and a charter sought from the American Congress; and, sir, if any sinister opposition has been made to the project, it comes from another source, which is not entitled perhaps to as much credit as the gentlemen who are the promoters of this Nicaragua enterprise.

Mr. SPINOLA. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question before he sits down—whether Judge Daly was not here as the paid attorney of this corporation?

Mr. COX. I have no doubt they ought to pay him for his work.

Mr. PAYSON. I demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question to allow me to offer an amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. SPINOLA. I desire to move to amend to make the time one hour.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded, and the amendment can not be entertained.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON].

The motion as modified was read, as follows:

That when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill incorporating the Nicaragua Canal Company, the bill be read by sections for amendment, and that debate on the first section and amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. On behalf of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to report from that committee, for reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 11795) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to reserve all points of order on that bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be reserved.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1305) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1305) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. On the first section of this bill all debate has been limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "act," line 41, page 3, to the word "may," in line 44, and insert "all shares, stocks, bonds, and certificates or other securities which the company may issue to raise the corporate capital shall be executed and issued at the principal office in the city of New York; and all such shares, stocks, bonds, certificates, or other securities shall be disposed of only for cash, to be paid into the company's treasury and used for corporate purposes: Provided, That this shall not apply to bonds or securities issued under article 50 of the concession of Nicaragua to the Canal Association.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the project which is contemplated by this bill. I know of nothing engaging public attention at this time which I deem of greater importance than the construction of an interoceanic canal, and that under the patronage, if not under the absolute control, of the Government of the United States. I indorse everything that has been said by gentlemen who have addressed this committee as to its importance and as to the character of the enterprise in connection with our position as a government.

But I think, Mr. Chairman, that all the flowers of rhetoric and all the exhibitions of eloquence that have been indulged in here shed but very little light upon what I regard as the essential portion of this legislation; and that is that whatever the Congress of the United States shall do with reference to incorporating this body, with reference to giving it the sanction of its approval, the details of the bill should be such that the American Congress will not be called upon ten, fifteen, or twenty years from now to look back upon an experience such as we have had with the Pacific railroads of this country that Congress has heretofore indorsed and approved.

I offer this amendment for this reason: I notice in this bill the most extraordinary provisions as well as the most extraordinary omissions; these provisions and omissions being more extraordinary in their nature than I have ever observed with reference to legislation of a similar character. The promoters of this enterprise come here and ask us to create them a body corporate. They already occupy that position by virtue of the action of the Legislature of Vermont, taken within the last few months. They have already as a corporation, under the powers conferred upon them by the Legislature of Vermont, everything that they would have if this bill should be passed now by this body. I need not say to lawyers here before me that a corporation, an artificial body created by legislative authority, has no legal existence and can be entitled to no recognition beyond the limits of the sovereignty which creates it. Every lawyer understands that; and it is only by comity on the part of the different States of this Union that a corporation created by one State is permitted to do business within the limits of the others. This corporation, if created either by the State of Vermont or by the action of Congress, can exercise no powers whatever in the Republic of Nicaragua or the Republic of Costa Rica except such as those two Governments choose to permit it to exercise. Why, then, is application made to Congress for this recognition after this corporation already has an organization under the laws of the State of Vermont? The answer to this question is found in a committee report which I hold in my hand (Senate Report No. 221, first session Fiftieth Congress), a report on this bill, in which a colloquy as taken down by the stenographer of that committee is set out and made a part of the report, wherein it is expressly stated on behalf of this company, by the promoters of this enterprise, that all that they desire incorporation for is to secure national recognition and national approval of the enterprise, in order that foreign capital may be more readily secured for its prosecution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I understood the amendment offered limiting the debate to forty minutes was adopted with the understanding that it should be divided equally between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair will endeavor to carry out that understanding.

Mr. CLARDY rose, and was recognized.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask leave to proceed for a moment or two longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARDY. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois for two minutes longer.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, as the time is so limited I will have to hurry on.

Now, it also appears in this same colloquy that it is not the expectation on the part of the promoters of this enterprise and not a dollar will be subscribed by them to the capital stock of this corporation. We are proposing in the bill a large capital stock of at least $100,000,000, which may be increased in the option of the company to $200,000,000, and in the bill there is no limitation whatever on the amount of bonds to be issued.

It also appears in the colloquy, to which I beg to call the attention of the committee, that it is the intention of the promoters of this enterprise to donate the capital stock of the corporation to those who subscribe for these bonds.

It is also said, and I ask the committee to mark this, that the "western method," which has been in operation for the last twenty years, is to be followed, and which, as Senator SHERMAN says in this colloquy, is well understood. Now, what is this "western method?" It is that every dollar subscribed by those who get in upon what is called the "ground floor" shall have donated to them an amount of stock equivalent to the amount of bonds for which they have subscribed. Look to the examples of this we have had in the West for the last twenty years. Of the common stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad of $49,000,000 not a dollar has been paid for by any one of its promoters or corporators.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. Five minutes run out very quickly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri only yielded to the gentleman from Illinois for two minutes.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will take the floor and give the gentleman from Illinois three minutes of my time.

Mr. PAYSON. I trust I may be allowed to proceed a moment longer.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a tabulation of a large number of the great roads in the West which proposed recently to go into a pool——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, so that members may hear what is going on.

Mr. PAYSON. I say, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand—and will print in the RECORD to save time in reading the names of the companies—a tabulated statement of the bonded debt of some Western roads, which exhibits the magnitude of the evil against which the amendment to this bill is directed. From this statement it will appear that these roads had stock outstanding of $933,638,543, and a bonded indebtedness of $959,237,580, and less than 40 per cent. was ever paid in in money on the stock of these great transcontinental roads. As to the Central and Union Pacific and their connections with the West, the amount outstanding of bonds issued under the patronage of this Government aggregates $97,097,000, and of that only a trifle over $1,000,000 was ever paid in in cash.

That tabulated statement is as follows:

Name of road.	Stock outstanding.	Bonded indebtedness.	Mileage.
Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé	$75,000,000	$48,813,000	8,000
Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern	5,500,000	14,964,000	1,046
Chicago, Burlington and Quincy	76,390,300	85,255,708	4,816
Chicago, Burlington and Northern	9,000,000	9,000,000	442
Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific	46,156,000	41,460,000	4,000
Chicago and Northwestern	64,100,321	103,433,500	4,383
Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul	61,276,861	119,236,000	5,069
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha	34,048,136	23,187,234	1,354
Central Iowa	10,026,800	8,687,142	636
Chicago and Alton	17,591,500	12,343,000	1,000
Denver and Rio Grande	61,650,000	31,757,500	1,471
Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri	30,000,000	6,165,000	1,351
Illinois Central	50,000,000	36,926,000	2,600
Minnesota and St. Louis	10,000,000	7,318,000	600
Missouri Pacific	45,000,000	69,459,837	6,000
Northern Pacific	86,786,199	72,069,500	2,808
St. Louis and San Francisco	30,000,000	31,766,000	1,457
Union Pacific	68,958,526	148,626,159	6,392
Wisconsin Central	11,435,000	9,860,000	700
Wabash	52,642,700	78,910,000	956
Southern Pacific	88,076,200	.....	1,200
Totals	933,638,543	959,237,580	56,884

So that, Mr. Chairman, the transportation of the entire freightage of this nation is being burdened with the payment, on the part of those who control paper evidences of this ownership, of interest on the bonded debt, and on the stock, which is "water" and nothing else.

The fictitious capital is recognized, and the transportation of the country must bear the burden of this as well as the actual capital invested.

Now, sir, the concession made by the Government of Nicaragua to the promoters of this enterprise is as follows:

ART. 51. In order that the Canal Association may indemnify itself for the expenses it may have had to incur for the verifications, preparations, explorations, and surveys hereinbefore mentioned, and for all other expenditures that it will have to make until the definite organization of the company, it shall have the right from the time of the organization of said company to 6 per cent. in shares, bonds, certificates, or other securities which the company may issue for the purpose of raising the corporate capital, and which are to be issued in excess of the capital to be subscribed.

These bonds, shares, or securities shall be identically like the subscription shares and issued from the same register or stock-book. As a consequence, they shall participate in all benefits, interests, partitions, dividends, sinking fund, rights, privileges, and of all the advantages given to the paid-up shares, bonds, or securities without any distinction whatever.

It will be seen that it is proposed in this concession that the promoters of this enterprise shall have one-sixth of the stock and bonds of the company, or other securities and certificates of indebtedness which shall be issued by this company, to pay them for what they have done in securing this concession. The amount, Mr. Chairman, these papers show these gentlemen have invested is less than $300,000; and therefore upon a capitalization of the minimum amount, that is, $100,000,000, and the issue of $100,000,000 worth of bonds upon that capitalization, it will give the promoters of this enterprise under this bill, if the amendment is not adopted, $27,000,000 of paid-up securities, and for an investment of less than $300,000; and the more these securities shall be increased the greater the amount of stock or bonds will be issued, and the power to increase the issue by the men interested is without limit; for if $200,000,000 in bonds and the same in stock are issued it will give the promoters of the enterprise in paid-up stocks and bonds $47,000,000 upon an investment of less than $300,000. If the House desires it to be done, then let it be done with its eyes open; but it will not be done without my persistent opposition.

Mr. BRYCE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has put in a nutshell our position touching this bill. If America does not grant this charter, will she prevent other countries from granting one? Will she be a dog in the manger and distinguish herself by a policy hostile to her reputation for liberality and her traditional love of progress?

Suppose, however, that she desires to prevent some other power from doing what she refuses to do herself; how will she stop such a nation? Will she go to war? Surely nothing worse than war could happen if the charter were granted. These gates will not remain forever closed, and it is natural to infer that some other government will be appealed to and that some other government will show a greater readiness in the matter than we have evinced. Then we may find that American vessels are unfairly discriminated against, as they are on certain canals in Canada and in spite of all guaranties of a uniformity in rates. At least we may see English boards of directors, hostile to our commercial supremacy, sitting in London and dictating the terms by which our vessels can use the great passage-way.

Here is an opportunity for this Government to obtain something for nothing, as it seems to me that the bill has everything to recommend it, with no counterbalancing disadvantage. We get an incalculable shortage of water-route to our Pacific coast, and are brought in close contact with the countries on the western border of South America. It is the open sesame to the East, the gates of which have been practically closed against us, opening up to us new markets, giving a ready sale to the surplus from our farms, our factories, and our mines, thereby increasing the value of the labor of those who toil and fulfilling in its highest sense the destiny of this country.

For these incalculable advantages, I have said, we give nothing; we do not sacrifice, so far as I can see, a single constitutional principle; we grant no money ourselves, and by express stipulation, printed on each bond and stock certificate, reiterate the fact of our absolute pecuniary irresponsibility. Further, if I understand correctly, we have, at the instance of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], reserved for ourselves the privilege of altering, amending, and repealing the act if we find that after it has gone into operation it should become advisable to do so, and we moreover regulate the tolls or tariff rates of transportation on both property and persons.

In short, we have so amended this bill as to rob it of every feature that could possibly involve the Government, and we directly shield the Government from responsibility should the project unfortunately turn out the lamentable failure the Panama Canal seems likely to do.

Lastly, we have only refused to entertain those amendments which were covert thrusts at the life of this bill, and which if adopted would practically prevent the project from being carried out at all.

These advantages, Mr. Chairman, have been already freely discussed on both sides of the House. There is, however, another aspect of this bill which I think has not yet received the attention it deserved. It is the effect of this canal as a competitor with our trunk lines of railroad, for it will prove more effective than any artificial restrictions that Government can devise to reduce rates between the far West and the far East.

In short, a great practical gain will be attained in return for the moral support of the Government, a support that is so defined, limited, and hedged around by restrictions that no sensible man, in my opinion, can hesitate to grant it. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. CLARDY. I believe the time on the other side has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that five minutes of the twenty minutes agreed upon yet remain.

Mr. CLARDY. It is true, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, that the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua could undertake to construct this canal under a charter from the State of Vermont. Any State in the Union could authorize the incorporation of a company for the construction of the canal. It is further true, as stated by him, that it would be a matter of comity to be determined by the Republic of Nicaragua as to the standing the association should have in the courts of that republic. But while it is true, sir that the Legislature of a State could grant such a charter, it is equally true that this is not an enterprise in the interest of any particular State. It is a great national, a great international enterprise, and I do not believe that any government in the world except the Government of the United States would hesitate to connect its name with the grandest commercial enterprise of all the centuries, when it may do so, as in this case, without the payment of a dollar, or becoming in any degree involved in any obligation in connection with it.

When these gentlemen go abroad, as they must go to get their money, with a charter from the Government of the United States, they will certainly have a respectable standing in the financial markets of the world. If they go with a charter from Vermont, the answer will be, "We do not know what the laws of Vermont are." But it is supposed, at least, everywhere that the Government of the United States through its Congress will do nothing in vain, and it is for this, and not because the persons seeking this act of incorporation expect any benefits by way of any grants of any kind on the part of the Government of the United States, that it is desired to have a charter from the General Government. They are not expecting anything, because in the charter, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, the idea that the Government should become involved in any respect is expressly negatived, and the sole object is to give respectability and a national character to an enterprise which is, in fact, national.

Now, a word in regard to what the gentleman has said about the issuance of stock. I beg to remind the gentleman that the stock of this company can only be issued for property, property rights, concessionary rights, or for money actually paid in. This is a great enterprise; and no man acquainted at all with financial transactions of this character will claim that this company can go into the markets of the world and by obtaining subscribers and stockholders raise the required money to build the canal. It can not be done in that way. It can only be done by issuing its bonds, which will operate as a mortgage lien upon the work, and which will be paid as the work progresses and when it is completed. The gentleman from Illinois objects to this procedure. Reference has been made to some witness who appeared before the Senate committee, I do not understand who he was, and testified in relation to the buying of stock at the time of the issuance of the bonds to the persons who took them. I say to the gentleman that he may read the first and second sections of this bill, which treat altogether of that question, and if he reads them closely he will come to the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the stock can not be issued except, as I have already said, in payment of property, property rights, or concessionary rights, or for money actually paid in.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask that the pending amendment be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The question being taken on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. PAYSON, on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 52.

Mr. CLARDY. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order that no quorum has voted?

Mr. BAYNE. I will make the point for the purpose of having tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that a yea-and-nay vote in the House might be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. CLARDY and Mr. PAYSON were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 69.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, it is agreed, so far as we may agree, that a vote may be taken in the House upon this amendment, on which condition the point of no quorum will be withdrawn.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not understand that a quorum has voted.

Mr. PAYSON. It is agreed between us, so far as we can agree, that the pending amendment may be offered in the House and a vote there taken upon it, and the point of no quorum will be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a private agreement that of course can not bind the House.

Mr. PAYSON. We understand that, but we have reached the agreement amongst ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote on the pending amendment being a tie vote, and the point of no quorum having been withdrawn, the amendment is rejected, and the Clerk will report the next section of the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend, in line 53, page 3, by striking out, after the word "mixed," the balance of the line, including the word "corporation," in line 54.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment proposes to strike out "including its franchises to be a corporation."

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. PAYSON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 46.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

The committee again divided, and, pending the count,

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Chairman, the point of no quorum is withdrawn.

Mr. PAYSON. And I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of said company shall consist of not less than one million shares of $100 each, with the right to increase the capital stock to two million shares of $100 each, upon the vote of two-thirds of the stock of said company at any time outstanding, which shares shall in all respects be deemed personal property and shall be transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said corporation may provide. Five incorporators, who shall be chosen by a majority of the number from those named in this act, shall have power to open books of subscription to the capital stock of said company in the city of New York, and at such other places in the United States, Nicaragua, or elsewhere, as they may designate, who shall receive all subscriptions for stock; and no stock shall be transferable except upon the books of the company provided for that purpose. The said incorporators shall give thirty days' notice of the time and place of the opening of said books, by publication in one daily newspaper in New York City, and one newspaper in Managua, Nicaragua, and one in San José, Costa Rica, if the said canal should be in part in the territory of that Republic. Sixty days' previous notice shall be given of the payment required, of the time and place of payment, by publication in one daily newspaper in the city of New York, and in one newspaper in Managua, Nicaragua, and one in San José, Costa Rica, if the said canal should be in part in the territory of that Republic; and in case any stockholder shall neglect or refuse to pay, in pursuance of such notice, the stock held by him may be sold to the highest bidder for cash, according to the regulations to be made therefor in the by-laws of said company. The directors hereinafter provided for may adopt regulations and by-laws not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Mr. SPINOLA. I offer the following amendment to the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed, on page 4, section 2, line 3, to strike out, after the word "each," down to and including the word "each" in line 4.

Mr. PAYSON. What is that amendment? How does it amend the section?

Mr. SPINOLA. It will limit the shares to a hundred million dollars.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That the capital stock of said company shall consist of not less than one million shares of $100 each."

It strikes out the following:

"With the right to increase this capital stock to two million shares at $100 each."

Mr. PAYSON. I understand it now.

Mr. SPINOLA. The purpose of this amendment is to limit, as far as possible, the amount of capital stock which this company shall have the right to issue. It is very manifest, sir, upon the statement of the friends of this enterprise, as laid before us from time to time during the late session, that this entire work can be completed for $75,000,000. Now, it occurs to me to confine the amount of capital which they shall have the right to issue to one hundred millions will give them all they should want to ask for.

Mr. HOLMAN. The estimated cost is $64,000,000.

Mr. SPINOLA. I know that, but we will make a little leeway for them to cover incidentals that have been spoken of. Now, sir, one hundred millions ought to be abundant, with these facts before us, especially that the amount of bonds are not to be limited. It is provided, I think, in the same section giving them the right to issue bonds to an unlimited amount. Now, sir, there is no safety in permitting them to increase their capital stock to two hundred millions, for the simple reason that as the matter stands to-day, especially from the facts as presented to us for our consideration, the first hundred millions of this stock will be issued to a construction company as fully paid-up stock. That will allow them to give this construction company which is to do this work all the stock and bonds that this corporation shall issue after they have been created under this act.

Now, sir, I propose as a matter of common prudence and caution on the part of Congress to limit the amount to $100,000,000.

One hundred million dollars is a vast sum of money, and in the earlier days of the Republic if Congress had undertaken to entertain a proposition from any source whatever to create a corporation with a capital of $100,000,000 it would have raised the whole nation in opposition.

Mr. DUNN. If they had called for an army of a million men they would never have got them.

Mr. SPINOLA. I did not comprehend the remark of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. RAYNER. What is the stock of the Panama Canal?

Mr. SPINOLA. I do not know. I do not know about the Panama Canal. To-day we are speaking about this scheme in regard to Nicaragua which asks for the right at the hands of Congress to issue $200,000,000 of capital stock——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. For a parallel canal.

Mr. SPINOLA. And an unlimited number of bonds. They do not say what it is for. It is simply to create this canal, and the company has already, as I am informed, agreed to the contract of the construction company, who will receive all the stocks and bonds as fully paid-up bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I confess to some surprise that the Congress of the United States should hesitate for one moment to advance a project such as the one presented in this bill. Gentlemen of well-known reputation, gentlemen of high character, gentlemen of means have consented, if Congress would give them the necessary legislation, to build this canal. They do not come and ask Congress to appropriate a single dollar for the construction of this canal, neither presently nor prospectively.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BAYNE. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman says they are persons of high character, and that they are ready and willing to build the canal.

I would like to know who those gentlemen are, if we are to act upon statements like that.

Mr. BAYNE. In the first place I have the statement from persons who know the gentlemen that they are men of means and high character.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman know who they are himself?

Mr. BAYNE. I do not know them personally.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman know their names?

Mr. BAYNE. Their names are in the body of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Those are the gentlemen who have the capital to carry out this enterprise?

Mr. BAYNE. Those gentlemen have means; they have capital, but there are probably others who will be connected with the enterprise. But, Mr. Chairman, the good faith of the gentlemen engaged in this enterprise is unquestionable, and for Congress now to stand in the way of this project seems to me to be utterly unjustifiable. We read in the papers that the French Government proposes to complete the Panama Canal, an enterprise which thus far has proven a failure, and whose prospects are not apparently very good; yet when the gentlemen proposing this enterprise come to Congress and ask authority to build this canal, ask simply that a charter be given them by the Congress of the United States, we find objection after objection interposed, and we see that the scheme is to be defeated, if it possibly can be defeated, by gentlemen who do not seem to have any more at heart the welfare of the country than those who are promoting it.

I have received communications from persons who are engaged in rival enterprises, endeavoring to persuade me that I should oppose this measure. They do not come at it directly, because none of the enemies of this project can afford to attack it directly, but they attack it by indirection, by efforts to cast obloquy upon it as a jobbing scheme and all that sort of thing. There is no foundation for anything of that kind, and nobody is justified in making any such statement, and I trust that every gentleman in this House who can appreciate the importance of this great water way, who knows that it will be a rival of the trans-continental railways and will enable us to transport freight from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboard at probably one-third or perhaps one-fourth or possibly one-fifth of the present cost of such transportation—I trust, I say, that gentlemen who appreciate this view and who are in favor of promoting the commerce of our country in this way will stand as a unit for this measure. More than that, I hope it will not be necessary for the friends of this bill upon the floor to go around among members and importune them to come down and pass between the tellers in order that this bill may pass. I hope that gentlemen will take sufficient interest in the bill to pass between the tellers and vote upon the various amendments that are offered here and that are intended to handicap this bill, and I hope they will vote rapidly, so that we may get the bill through, because this bill is going through if we have got to take every Friday until the adjournment of Congress.

I discover two modes of attack upon this bill. One is to attempt to eviscerate from it all the provisions that give it force and effect, and the other is to put upon it a lot of extraneous provisions which will so handicap the corporators that after it gets through it will not amount to anything. These are the two modes of attack. Now, let the friends of the bill resist those attacks and pass it, and the ultimate result will vindicate the wisdom of Congress in enacting this measure.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] seems to be cracking some sort of a whip here, notifying the friends of this bill as to the method of procedure they are to adopt in order to pass it, how they are to vote, and that they are to vote quickly; and he has told the House that this bill is to pass if it takes all the Fridays of this session to pass it. I confess, sir, that that mode of advancing does not address itself to my judgment, nor does it lead me to the conclusion which the gentleman himself seems to have reached, that this bill is exactly what it should be, and that improper methods and reasons are being resorted to in order to prevent its passage. The gentleman stated in the outset of his remarks that there were persons named in this bill who were ready and willing to construct this canal, that they had all the money that they needed, and were able and willing to take charge of the work and complete it. If that be true, they have already a charter from the State of Vermont, as has been stated here, and what more do they require? If that be true, what occasion is there for applying the whip of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and notifying the friends of this bill that their triumph is assured?

Mr. Chairman, I can not see any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York. If $75,000,000, or $64,000,000, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, is the estimated cost of this work, why is it that stock to the amount of $100,000,000 is not satisfactory?

Why is it that various provisions of this bill which gentlemen at first regarded as wise have been corrected by amendment in this House? Simply because the whole project and the circumstances surrounding it have tended to suggest the idea that the money is at hand and that there are men capable and willing to do this work.

It has been said that the reason for asking a charter from the Government of the United States is that this enterprise may have the "moral support" of the Government, and thereby funds may be raised for the construction of the work. What does this "moral support" mean? Are we to understand that persons in other countries who are to be invited to subscribe to this stock are to be led to believe that in some way or other—undefined, unascertainable in exact terms perhaps in this bill—the Government of the United States is behind the enterprise guarantying that there is nothing fraudulent or wrong about it? Is this what is meant by having the "moral support" of the Government of the United States? If this be true, and if there should be hereafter any mismanagement or mistakes by which this work shall be delayed, I affirm, sir, that with plausibility, with arguments which can not be gainsaid, the parties who may be affected may come into this or some succeeding House and insist that the Government has given credit to these corporators and is bound, as a matter of fair play, to aid in the construction of the work by the indorsement of the bonds of the company or otherwise. Mr. Chairman, it is because I do not believe that the sole object is to get a charter; it is because I believe there is an ultimate purpose to involve the Government by the indorsement of the bonds of this company or otherwise that I am opposing this measure.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] seems to base his observations upon the idea that because this enterprise is a commendable one, therefore the bill which its promoters present for our consideration is the bill which must be passed, and that any opposition to the terms of the bill involves necessarily opposition to the scheme itself. I desire to be understood as favoring the proposal to build this canal; but I am concerned that the bill which we may pass shall be one which will commend itself to our judgment when the labor shall be concluded, without regard to the length of time it may require for its consideration; and while I appreciate and indorse the courage which impels the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a friend of the bill, to say that it will be passed if it takes every Friday of this session, I still insist that he ought to modify that statement by recognizing that if the bill should pass, it is, beyond all, important that it should be passed in the right shape.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says there is nothing in this bill from which deduction can be drawn that any job can be perpetrated under it, or that anything unfair is intended as to the building of this canal. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he is in favor of limiting the securities which shall be issued by this corporation to an amount necessary for its construction and the expenses incident thereto?

Mr. BAYNE. I should favor that proposition.

Mr. PAYSON. Very well.

Mr. BAYNE. But perhaps you and I would differ as to what that amount should be.

Mr. PAYSON. I am not concerning myself just now as to the exact amount, but as to the principle. Now, let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the men who are behind this plan, the men who appeared before the Senate committee, have placed themselves upon record as saying that they expect to issue the capital stock of this corporation without a dollar being paid thereon. Has the gentleman read the remarks made before the Senate committee, and to be found in this Senate report?

Mr. BAYNE. No.

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "no."

Mr. BAYNE. But the Senate passed the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I agree that the Senate passed the bill; but I commend to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the reading of this evidence and these statements before the Senate committee; he will find in them what a respected governor of my State used to say was to be found in the Bible—some "highly interesting matter." I assert (and the record bears me out in this assertion) that what the promoters of this enterprise declared before the Senate committee is what is intended to be done.

Now, the estimated cost of this canal, the estimate having been given by those who have made detailed surveys, is $64,000,000. Assuming for the purpose of argument, and giving the company the benefit of any possible doubt, that the cost would be $100,000,000 for the completion of this enterprise, can any gentleman on this floor give any reason why in this bill we should authorize the issuing of $200,000,000 in stock and an unlimited amount of bonds? Nobody offers to answer that question.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Does the gentleman want an answer now in his own time, or in the time of some one else?

Mr. PAYSON. I would like to have an answer right now.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will give it to you "right now." In the dispatches from Europe this morning we see the fate of one of the great enterprises of the Isthmus. There is a concern that started with a prospectus for the building of a canal for $150,000,000. To-day the funded debt of the De Lesseps Canal is $350,000,000, to which should be added $50,000,000 of floating indebtedness. The shares which, when the stock of this company was first floated in the stock market, stood at 500 in Paris, stand to-day at 126. There is bankruptcy at once. There is a canal that notwithstanding the pledges of the French Republic that it should be free to all nations of the world, that no guaranty of that republic, in any case, should impair that pledge, has reached such a condition it must be a government work, under the guaranty of that republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I should like to have one minute more.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from New York may have five minutes in order that he may answer the question I asked him.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do not desire five minutes longer, but I would like to have a minute or two more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PAYSON. I now hope the gentleman will answer the question I put to him.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I will. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am aware that from sixty-five to seventy-five millions of dollars have been named as the amount of money needed for this construction, yet there is a likelihood that another hundred million of dollars will be required. For I say we have this object-lesson of De Lesseps. This charter would have to come back for amendment. Whether it would be amended or not by a subsequent Congress is in doubt from the obstruction put upon this great measure here. I question if it would receive any amendment, even to save its life, from another Congress. But I am in favor of it as it has passed the scrutiny of the Senate, as it is demanded by the character of like works, and that that one hundred millions shall be made two hundred millions, so that even if this canal is to cost half the other one it will be a success, and they will not have to come back to the Government for new guaranties or new concessions.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that it has been said here that the incorporators of this company said before the committee that $64,000,000 would be sufficient for the completion of this work. I have had some opportunity to hear what was said, being a member of the Committee on Commerce, and before the Committee on Commerce they did not make that statement. They said it was estimated roughly; it would in all probability cost a much larger sum.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in this connection?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota who made these surveys and these estimates?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not remember the names of the engineers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman whether Mr. Menocal has not made several surveys and estimated as low as $75,000,000?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I do not care what may be the character or the standing of the engineer who makes these estimates. Any person who has paid attention to public works and has a knowledge of these things, knows, in all probability, they will cost twice or thrice as much as the estimates. Hence the attempt to limit this to $100,000,000 would be a grave mistake, because it may cost much more. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

Mr. CLARDY. Just a word, Mr. Chairman, on the point discussed by the gentleman from Minnesota. There have been three estimates submitted by as many engineers of the cost of this work. One estimate is as low as $48,000,000, and that was made by Mr. Menocal several years ago. Another estimate was made by Commander Lull that it would cost $64,000,000; and still another, by Commander McFarland, that it would cost $147,000,000.

So you will see the cost of this canal, even with the Engineer Corps, is a matter of conjecture. It may cost $147,000,000, it may cost even more than that. Hence it would be folly, it seems to me, to restrict the amount of capital stock to $100,000,000.

As I had occasion to say several minutes ago, no stock can be issued except for property necessary to the construction of this canal.

Mr. SPINOLA. In cash?

Mr. CLARDY. Yes; in cash actually paid in. If my time is expired, I will ask now that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate. If, however, we can come to a vote, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CLARDY. I move that the committee rise with a view to limit debate.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 33.

Mr. SPINOLA. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the committee determined to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLANCHARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill S. 1305 had come to no understanding thereon.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, and pending that I move that all debate upon the second section and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. SPINOLA. I offer an amendment——

Mr. CLARDY. And on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPINOLA. I believe I have the floor. I offer an amendment to that proposition, that the time shall be limited to one hour and a half on this section with the various amendments that are now pending or may be offered hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Make it an hour.

Mr. SPINOLA. Very well, I will say an hour. My purpose in moving that amendment——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PAYSON. I move a further amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, that the limit of time apply to all the pending amendments only.

Mr. BAYNE. All proposed amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. No, that will not do.

Mr. SPINOLA. My amendment is to pending and proposed amendments.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York that it is much more desirable to have the time limited upon pending amendments; for some important, practical amendment may come up without debate at all. I would suggest that he make it twenty minutes on the pending amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. That is right.

Mr. SPINOLA. We can not take less than an hour. This is an important subject. Gentlemen can not debate it under an hour.

Mr. PAYSON. What became of my amendment to limit it to the pending amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Missouri who made this motion did not make it to the pending amendment, but to the paragraph and all amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. Pending and proposed amendments?

Mr. CLARDY. All amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, as the Chair understood him, moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri so as to limit debate to one hour on section and amendments.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend the proposition by inserting the word "pending."

Mr. SPINOLA. I accept that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition is now as proposed by the gentleman from New York, with the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] accepted, that debate shall be limited to one hour upon pending amendments to the section.

The question was put; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SPINOLA. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 86.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes are 16 and the noes 86. The noes have it, and the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that the point of no quorum was not made until after the result of the vote had been announced.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen from New York was endeavoring to rise before the Chair announced the vote.

Mr. DUNHAM. The Chair gave the gentleman from New York no opportunity to rise and make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLOUNT. I saw it myself.

Mr. SPINOLA. I admit I get up very slowly, because I can not avoid it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANCHARD). The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24, noes 144.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARDY. I demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. PAYSON. I move to amend the proposition made by the gentleman from Missouri by making the time twenty minutes on pending amendments.

Mr. BAYNE. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] to modify that by making it thirty minutes, and to come to a vote.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that I understand the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors proposes to bring the river and harbor bill up for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. WEAVER. The Committee on Territories desires to go on with the Oklahoma bill; and therefore we do not wish the House to adjourn over.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It is a matter of entire indifference to me whether the House adjourn over or not; but I have been requested by a good many gentlemen on both sides of the House to make the motion to adjourn over, so that members can have to-morrow for their departmental and other work.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on his motion or withdraw it?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I feel that after I have made that statement I must leave the question to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I take the liberty of saying that under the circumstances——

Mr. CLARDY. I demand the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw his motion?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not feel, under the circumstances, at liberty to withdraw the motion, and therefore I must leave it to the House to determine.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope before the question is put I may be allowed to say that this matter was the occasion of consultation between the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and certain other gentlemen, and that he was very much opposed to adjournment, as he desired to go on with the river and harbor bill to-morrow.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope I may be permitted to state that the chairman of the Committee on Territories is not present, but I know personally that he desires to procced to-morrow with the Oklahoma bill if it can be done.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I take it for granted that as to the Oklahoma bill it is to be like the poor—we are always to have it with us.

Mr. WEAVER. Until this House comes to a vote upon it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. As to the river and harbor bill, my experience is that it can get consideration whenever it chooses, so that it does not matter whether it starts in with Saturday or with Monday.

The SPEAKER. This motion is not debatable.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 44.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-one gentlemen have risen in support of the demand for the yeas and nays—not one-fifth of the last vote.

Several MEMBERS. The other side.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and seven gentlemen have risen in opposition, and one-fifth not having voted in the affimative, the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Fourteen only have risen—not one-fifth of a quorum—and tellers are refused. The yeas and nays have been refused, tellers have been refused, the ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 7843) granting to Citrous Water Company right of way across Papago Indian reservation, in Maricopa County, Arizona; and

A bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham.

NICARAGUA MARITIME CANAL COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] will please restate his motion.

Mr. CLARDY. I moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the further consideration of the pending bill, and that all debate on the second section and amendments thereto, pending and otherwise, be limited to ten minutes. After that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] offered an amendment confining the limitation to pending amendments, and making the time twenty minutes, and upon that I called the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the further consideration of the pending bill; and pending that he moves that all debate upon the second section and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] moves to amend by striking out "ten" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. PAYSON. And also by limiting the motion to the section and the pending amendments.

Mr. CLARDY. My motion applies to all amendments to the section. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] that I am willing to agree to twenty minutes, provided the limitation applies to all the amendments to the section.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not agree to that. I am willing to have a short limitation, provided it be confined to pending amendments; but I desire to have it so that those who have substantial amendments to offer shall have an opportunity to discuss them.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. PAYSON; and there were—ayes 15, noes 63.

Mr. SPINOLA. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 13, noes 150.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the previous question has already been ordered. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY].

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 18.

Mr. SPINOLA. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SPINOLA and Mr. CLARDY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 148, noes 16.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 this evening.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 69.

Mr. SPINOLA. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. SPINOLA and Mr. CLARDY.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening, as it is evident we can not get a quorum again before the regular hour for adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the tellers report ayes 10, noes 110. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] asks by unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

There was no objection; and the House accordingly (at 4.20 p. m.) took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who caused the following to be read:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole I desire to ask the consideration of four bills which were improperly considered by the Committee of the Whole at the session of last Friday night, House bills not being in order at that time under the rules. In view of the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of these bills and that they be taken up now and passed.

HOUSE BILLS PASSED.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of House bills of the following titles (considered informally by the Committee of the Whole at last Friday night's session), and the bills were severally taken up, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 11223) to increase the pension of George A. Glover;

A bill (H. R. 9163) granting a pension to Eli Garrett;

A bill (H. R. 11378) granting a pension to James S. Harden; and

A bill (H. R. 9654) granting an increase of pension to Jesse J. Clark.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YODER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the order pursued last Friday evening, and which has been followed at a number of these evening sessions, be adopted this evening; in other words, that the roll be called, and each member as his name is reached be allowed to call up a bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. There was a bill pending when the committee rose last Friday night. This order would not affect that.

Mr. MORRILL. My proposition is that we resume the call where we stopped on last Friday night.

Mr. FINLEY. I feel constrained in the discharge of a duty to object. Quite a number of pension bills have been left on the Calendar from last session, and they should not be deprived of their opportunity for consideration. Among these bills are several which I have not had the opportunity to call up, for the relief of imbecile women who are in destitute circumstances. I think that in fairness gentlemen should not slip through their bills reported at this session, while these other bills for the relief of persons equally meritorious and really in want, are thrust aside. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest that the gentleman's purpose can be accomplished much sooner by allowing each member as his name is reached on the call of the roll to bring up a bill. There are not many members here to-night.

Mr. YODER. We are nearly at the foot of the roll. I sat here through the whole of last Friday night's session waiting to call up a bill; and I shall object to anything being done unless we continue the same course which we have pursued heretofore.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose a week ago there was pending a bill which I had called up. I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of that bill be finished.

Mr. SPRINGER. As that bill is now pending, I submit to the Chair it will not require unanimous consent to finish its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I am satisfied that if the demand for the regular order be persisted in we can do no business to-night, and I therefore move that the committe rise. We may as well go home at once as wait here uselessly for two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN] moves that the committee rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that motion will not be insisted upon. There is a bill now pending.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I withdraw the motion.

ELIZA J. ALEXANDER.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill pending when the Committee of the Whole rose a week ago.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that in this case the bill and report had been read and an amendment striking out "$50" and inserting "$30" had been adopted. The question is now on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The House bill of similar title and substance to the one just disposed of will, in the absence of objection, be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the first bill in order.

Mr. CARUTH. I presume if there is no one to call up a bill, it will be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order has been demanded by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent that when any bill is reached in regular order, and its title has been read, it be passed over, if no member asks for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. MCRAE. I object to that. Unless we can go through with the order heretofore, let us proceed to call the Calendar.

MARY E. JOHNSTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston, reported with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Johnston, dependent daughter of E. Johnson, late of Company A, Sixty-fourth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Add after the words "Veteran Volunteer Infantry" the words "and pay to her legally-constituted guardian a pension of $18 per month," and strike out of the bill the words "E. Johnson" and insert in lieu thereof the words "E. Johnston."

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston, having considered the same, report it back, and recommend its passage with the following amendments, to wit:

Add after the words "Veteran Volunteer Infantry" the words "and pay to her legally-constituted guardian a pension of $18 per month," and strike out of the bill the words "E. Johnson" and insert in lieu thereof the words "E. Johnston."

Your committee adopt and make part hereof the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 146, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston, have examined the same, and report:

"This claim was disallowed by the Pension Bureau January 8, 1883, on the ground that the minor was over sixteen years old at the death of the soldier. The claim is prosecuted by the legal guardian of the soldier's daughter. This ward has been an imbecile ever since her birth, and has been wholly dependent upon her brother since the death of her father, who was killed in battle May 30, 1864. She was then between seventeen and eighteen years of age.

"The theory of the pension act regarding dependent minors is that they shall be entitled to pensions during childhood, which for the purposes of the act ends when the minor becomes sixteen years of age, at which age the beneficiary usually becomes capable of earning a living. To care for dependent childhood was the object. This ward is, and always will be, a child in everything but years, and would have been dependent on her father, had he lived, as fully in her advanced age as in mere infancy.

"The passage of the above bill is recommended."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES A. STOCKMAN.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I ask by unanimous consent to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10260) to place the name of Charles A. Stockman, of Dundee, Mich., on the pension-roll.

Mr. FINLEY. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I have a bill which was passed at the last evening session. It is Senate bill 2333, granting a pension to George W. Fogel.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY] has demanded the regular order. Now, I understand when objection is made and the regular order is demanded, that demand continues until it is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KILGORE. If it is not the rule, then it ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky insist on his demand for the regular order?

Mr. FINLEY. I have not taken it back.

JULIA TRIGGS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed, as objection is insisted upon, to call the Calendar in regular order, commencing with the bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia Triggs, mother of William Triggs, deceased, formerly of Company D, Twenty-third Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs, submit the following report:

The soldier, William Triggs, enlisted in June, 1861, re-enlisted as a veteran in 1864, and was discharged with his regiment at the close of the war. He died of blood poisoning and lung disease July 2, 1875.

Claim of mother, Julia Triggs, was rejected February 12, 1887, on the ground "that the cause of the soldier's death, blood poisoning, was not due to any disability contracted while in the service."

The testimony on file in the Pension Office shows that soldier contracted blood poisoning by drinking water from the wells that had been poisoned by the enemy and by eating food in rebel houses that had been poisoned, and that when he came home on veteran furlough he was covered with sores, the result of said poisoning. But he partially recovered and went back to his regiment and remained with his regiment until the close of the war, doing duty as he could. That when he returned home after his discharge he was still suffering with the effects of blood poisoning, and his lungs were also affected; but, notwithstanding, he managed to support his mother by his labor as a tailor until within eighteen months prior to his death, in 1875, during which eighteen months he was nursed by his mother.

The testimony also shows that in 1875, the date of the soldier's death, claimant had no real property and no personal property except a little clothing, in value about $100, and that there was no one legally bound to support her, her husband—the father of soldier—having been drowned in Lake Michigan in 1868. Testimony also shows that claimant had three sons in the Army; one of her sons, Richard, brother of soldier, died at Newport, Ky., while in the Union service.

Claimant is now sixty-seven years of age, and feeble and in a tottering condition, on the verge of the grave.

The testimony fully shows that the soldier was poisoned as above set forth, and the only question is whether that caused his death or not. The record further shows that the soldier was in the army hospital after the poisoning, but the record does not show for what disease he was treated, as the records are very imperfect, but the evidence shows that the soldier was a healthy man before the poisoning, and after that that he was constantly sick with blood poisoning, and a liberal construction of the testimony we think warrants the conclusion that he died of this disease, and your committee therefore recommend that this bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MCRAE. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. When we resolved ourselves into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar I understand it was agreed to call the roll of members alphabetically.

Mr. MORRILL. That was objected to.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent, which was asked and granted, was in reference to the four bills passed at the last evening session.

The question recurred on Mr. MCRAE'S motion that the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had, according to order, had the special assignment under consideration, and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs, reported favorably, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendments to the bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander and to the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston were agreed to, and the bills as amended were severally ordered to a third reading; and they were accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BILL LAID ON THE TABLE.

The bill (H. R. 10350) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, was laid on the table.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, would the demand for the regular order still prevail?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not within the province of the Speaker of the House to decide as to matters in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The Chair misapprehends my question. It is, should the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House, whether the demand of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY] for the regular order would still hold good.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did understand the gentleman's question, and he will say again it is not within the province of the Speaker of the House to decide questions arising in the Committee of the Whole. That will be done in the committee and not in the House. The Chair has a well-defined idea of what is the parliamentary law in the matter, but will not undertake to determine any proceeding in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STRUBLE. I suppose it would be better for the gentleman to address his inquiry to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. I withdraw the motion for the moment to permit the gentleman from Kentucky to make a request.

Mr. CARUTH. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman can not yield the floor to any gentleman. If he withdraws the motion it must be without condition.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. KILGORE. I renew it.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 9, noes 26.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar under the special order.

Mr. CARUTH. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will yield to me, as I have a matter of unfinished business to call up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 26, noes 8.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask unanimous consent that the order which we have been pursuing for several weeks past at these evening sessions be continued to-night—that is to say, that the roll shall be called, beginning where we last stopped, and each member permitted, as his name is reached, to call up a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that until the demand for the regular order, made by the gentleman from Kentucky, is withdrawn the Chair can entertain no such request.

Mr. FINLEY. I am willing to make this statement if I can have consent for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not regard it as exactly fair that those bills which could not be called up, or were not called up, and which have been on the Calendar since the early part of the last session, just as meritorious cases, and reported by the same committee as those reported to the House at this session, should be displaced by bills which are now coming in from the committee at this late period in this Congress.

These bills coming in from this committee now are given a preference by such an arrangement as that contemplated here to-night. I do not believe that these bills first on the Calendar should be set aside for the passage of bills reported at this late date in the session. I have a number of bills on this Calendar that failed to receive action during the last session of Congress, granting pensions to persons who are imbecile in mind, helpless in body, and paupers, and which could not be passed; the sons and daughters of brave and gallant soldiers who died for the country. Now, I am willing to withdraw the demand for the regular order in so far as that a member when his name is reached may call from the list one of the bills thus carried over from the last session. I think they are entitled to preference and priority. I hold that it is only fair that this course should be pursued, and that some preference should be given such bills over those reported at this session.

I withdraw the demand for the regular order with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman can not withdraw the demand conditionally.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a request that the roll shall be called, beginning where we left off on Friday evening last, and that each member as his name is called shall have the right to ask consideration of any one of the cases upon the Calendar now under consideration which were reported favorably at the first session of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just stated, however, that no request for unanimous consent can be entertained while the demand for the regular order is pending.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not?

The CHAIRMAN. Because the regular order operates to cut off all such requests and brings the House directly to the consideration of business under its rules.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But this request is in the line of the demand of the gentleman from Kentucky, and he has consented to withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. SPOONER. Besides that, this is a different proposition for unanimous consent than that heretofore sought to be obtained.

The CHAIRMAN. But the practice is well settled that where the regular order is demanded and insisted upon requests for unanimous consent can not be entertained. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky not to withdraw the demand for the regular order except upon condition. That demand can not be withdrawn except absolutely.

Mr. SPOONER. Which condition I meet by the request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The request will be entertained as soon as the demand for the regular order is withdrawn, and can not be entertained under the rules until that time.

Mr. FINLEY. If I understand the gentleman's proposition, I am willing to withdraw the demand for the regular order, provided the bills called up for consideration to-night are those which were carried forward from the last session of Congress. That being the understanding and my desire, I withdraw the demand.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I renew the demand for the regular order, but ask consent to make a statement in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry.

I wish to ask whether gentlemen who were not here at the last session of Congress upon Friday evenings, when this order was adopted of calling the roll and letting each member ask consideration of a bill, can get up here now and insist upon obtaining privileges which were not granted to the others at that time, or granted to them now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the regular order was withdrawn without condition.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. But I understand the expectation is to obtain unanimous consent that shall embody the position of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MCRAE. I move the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 13, noes 18.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a motion that we begin the call at the bottom of the roll this evening, that is, with the W's, for instance, and going back. Let us try that plan. It is an entirely new proposition, and there is no selfishness in it.

Mr. KILGORE. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order has been already demanded by the gentleman from Ohio, which demand cuts off all requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. ENLOE. I renew it.

Mr. CHEADLE. I move the committee rise.

The question was put; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHEADLE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 13, noes 22.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I move that we now proceed with the roll-call, beginning where we ceased at the last meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] has demanded the regular order, that he still insists upon it, and that unless he withdraws the demand for the regular order requests for unanimous consent can not be entertained. The Clerk will report the first bill.

WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1638) granting a pension to William Richardson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Richardson, late a private in Company K, First Ohio Artillery.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1638) for a pension to William Richardson, beg leave to report:

Said bill passed the Senate, and the committee of the Senate made a report on said bill which this committee adopts.

Said report is in the words and figures as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 230, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1638) granting a pension to William Richardson, have carefully examined the same, and respectfully report:

"William Richardson, a private in Company K, First Regiment Ohio Light Battery, enlisted March 10, 1862, and was honorably discharged on the 13th of March, 1865, by reason of expiration of service. He applied for a pension in March, 1876, basing his claim upon the ground that he was wounded in the latter part of December, 1863, by a gunshot in the left side of the head from a gun in the hands of William Perkins, who was a member of his company, and in a state of intoxication.

"The claim was rejected June 2, 1877, on the ground that 'the wound was not received in the line of duty.'

"The claimant makes affidavit to the following circumstances happening at the time of his injury:

"'That he was on guard the day of the shooting, and was guard over a boy who was bucked and gagged; in the afternoon William Perkins wanted him to aid him to release the boy, and he refused to do so. After he was relieved Perkins wanted him to go and take the officers' whisky, and upon his refusing, Perkins called him a damned coward. After he had gone to bed late in the evening Perkins again came to him, and having waked him, wanted him to go with him to take a demijohn from the officers' tent, who were then absent.

"'Upon his refusal he said I was a damned coward and that he would kill me, and without further remark shot me. Perkins shot Sergeant Fairhurst, of my company. I am unable to do manual labor.'

"A number of the privates of Company K testify that the shooting was done by Perkins without any apparent cause or provocation, and Perkins himself says, 'I entered the tent where Richardson was in bed, and without any provocation fired my revolver at him, wounding him in the head;' that he did this while maddened with liquor.

"Some of the witnesses, when examined by a special agent of the Pension Bureau, testified that Richardson was teasing an old man, a member of the company, when Perkins interfered and shot him (referring to Private Quigley, then a member of the company). Private Quigley files his affidavit denying that he was present at the time of the shooting, and showing that he was then performing guard duty. And other witnesses, who previously testified to this fact, subsequently filed affidavits admitting that after having their recollections refreshed by conversation with their comrades they were satisfied that they had done the claimant an injustice, and that the time to which they referred was anterior to the date of the shooting.

"On May 18, 1876, Dr. Isaac Scott, examining surgeon, certified to the Pension Bureau that—

"'On examination of the applicant I find cicatrix showing scalp wound 2 inches in length on the crown of head, 1½ inches to the left of the sagittal suture and in line with it. Applicant states that a number of spiculæ of bone have come out since he received the wound, and he complains of pain in that side of the head, and giddiness on stooping. In my opinion the said William Richardson is one-half totally incapacitated. The disability is probably permanent.'

"On November 9, 1880, George O. Hildreth, examining surgeon, certified to the bureau that—

"'In my opinion the said William Richardson is three-eighths incapacitated; that the disability is permanent. The top of the head shows no cicatrix, but a groove or depression is felt in the left parietal bone about an inch from the line of the sagittal suture. It commences near the coronal suture and runs back about 2 inches, like a furrow. It seems to be two or three lines wide, the border or edge rather tender on pressure. He alleges a feeling of heat about the wound; pains extending front and back, irregular in character, and increased by stooping work and by heat of weather; occasional vertigo; results, as stated, of a raking revolver wound of scalp and cranium.'

"This analysis of the testimony clearly establishes the existence of three facts:

"First. That the claimant received a wound on the left side of the head;

"Second. That the wound so received was from a ball fired from a pistol in the hands of a comrade while under the influence of liquor, without provocation and while the claimant was in bed; and

"Third. That in the opinion of one examining surgeon his disability should be rated at one-half, and in the opinion of the other examining surgeon at three-eighths disability.

"The record discloses another important fact as bearing upon the right of this claimant to a pension under the law as it existed, where it states the fact that Sergeant Fairhurst was pensioned for injury of the left knee, caused by the accidental discharge of a pistol in the hands of Private Perkins. In the one case the injury was received at the hands of Private Perkins by the 'accidental discharge' of his pistol, and in the other by the deliberate and unprovoked discharge of his pistol with intent to injure the claimant.

"It is impossible for the committee to draw so fine a distinction as the Pension Bureau in these two cases. The committee is of opinion that Sergeant Fairhurst was properly pensioned, and they are equally of opinion that the claimant, William Richardson, is entitled to be placed on the pension-roll.

"Senate bill No. 1638 is therefore reported favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass."

And the committee, being satisfied with the justice of the claim of the said William Richardson, recommend that said bill do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The question was put, and it was announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 24.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. KILGORE and Mr. YODER as tellers.

Mr. CARUTH. The trouble about this bill is that the gentleman who introduced it is not here to withdraw it.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside until the gentleman who introduced it shall appear, and that it retain its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas that the bill be laid aside and retain its place on the Calendar?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I would ask whether we can take that course, it being a Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I am willing that that course shall be taken.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. I now ask unanimous consent to go on in the order which we have previously adopted. I do not think the gentleman who has demanded the regular order, when he reflects, will think it is exactly fair to those whose names are low on the list. I think he ought at least to withdraw it until we have gone through the list, and given fair play to all around.

Mr. McRAE. I move that the committee rise, unless the course suggested can be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. If the demand for the regular order be withdrawn the Chair will entertain the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHEELER. He will withdraw.

Mr. McRAE. Why is it not withdrawn, then?

A MEMBER. It is a case of misplaced confidence. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I simply rose for the purpose of getting unanimous consent to say one word in furtherance of what was said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]. It is this. The gentleman from Tennessee did interpose a call for the regular order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to enforce the regular order.

Mr. KILGORE. Let us not have any more speech-making.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I heartily and sincerely indorse what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has said; and I hope no one will interpose an objection.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] has demanded the regular order, and has not withdrawn the demand. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] that the committee rise.

The question was put; and it was announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McRAE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 20.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ELIZABETH JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4182) granting a pension to Elizabeth Jones.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. When the regular order has been demanded, and when we have transacted other business, such as that of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] requesting unanimous consent, is it required that the demand for the regular order shall be renewed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, especially when the gentleman who made the demand is present.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then ought not the gentleman be required to rise and make the demand for the regular order, or when a gentleman makes a demand for the regular order in the morning is it good for the remainder of the day?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to hold that the regular order is still demanded, especially as the gentleman from Tennessee who made the demand for the regular order is present, is advised of the procedure of the House, and has not withdrawn it. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Jones, dependent mother of William Jones, deceased, who was a private soldier in Company D, Fifteenth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The soldier, William Jones, enlisted August 14, 1862, and was drowned February 28, 1864. His mother filed her declaration for pension January 9, 1880, and the same was rejected October 22, 1885, on the ground that the soldier was not in line of duty when drowned. The testimony shows this state of facts, and there is no dispute about it:

The soldier was drowned February 28, 1864, while out on a pass granted to him by orders of the colonel of the regiment to attend divine worship on the Sabbath. While crossing the Potomac River on his return to camp the ice upon which he was walking gave way and he was drowned. The body was recovered and his clothing searched. There was no liquor on his person. The soldier was a steady man, and of very sober habits. The claimant's husband is dead and she is poor and has no means of support whatever, and the soldier left no widow.

The committee therefore recommend that this bill do pass, believing that the soldier lost his life in the line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was put; and it was announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Division.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to ask if, before the regular order was demanded, it was not the order of this House the roll should be called on pension nights and only such bills be taken up as were called up by each member in his turn. I feel quite confident that that is the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not correct in that respect. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read the special order under which we are acting.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, until further ordered, on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. the House shall take a recess until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar granting pensions, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on the Judiciary removing political disabilities, shall be considered, and no other business shall be transacted at such evening sessions, and the House shall adjourn on each of said evenings not later than 10 p. m.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill aside with the recommendation that it do pass; and there were—ayes 27, noes 3.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. BOOTHMAN and Mr. YODER.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar, under the special order, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. E. P. ALLEN: A bill (H. R. 11797) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ann E. Gridley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of the Board of Control of the New Basin Canal and Shell Road, in New Orleans, for an appropriation of $250,000 for the improvement of said canal—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The following petitions against the passage of the international copyright bill were received, and severally referred to the Committee on Patents:

By Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL: Of printers, pressmen, and others, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

By Mr. DORSEY: Of J. E. McCray and of Douglas Hewitt, of Nebraska.

By Mr. HATCH: Of M. L. Johnson, of Queen City, and of Griffith Frost, of Edina, Mo.

By Mr. WALKER: Of C. E. Stokes, of Dexter, Mo.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 17, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

LELAND STANFORD, a Senator from the State of California, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting vouchers relating to public buildings at Wichita, Kans.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 6th instant, certified copies of the settlements made between the United States and the State of Oregon on account of the Modoc Indian war hostilities therein, and on account of her quota of direct tax; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of June 25, 1888, certain information in regard to the investigation and testing of the practicability of the deflective turrets designed by Chief Engineer N. B. Clark; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 13, 1888, a copy of the minutes of the proceeding of the commission lately appointed to obtain the consent of the Indians on the Sioux reservation to the act providing for opening a portion of that reservation; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 10, 1888, certain information concerning the execution of the provisions of section 17 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, amendatory of section 5352 of the Revised Statutes, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT ELECTRIC WIRES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate an appendix to the report of Maj. Charles W. Raymond on the subject of under-ground conduits for electric wires in the District of Columbia, with accompanying maps and papers; which will be referred to the Committee on Printing before being sent to the Committee on Appropriations, for an estimate of the cost of their printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for legislation to prevent the adulteration of food; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New Mexico, praying for the creation of a new land district and the location of a land office at Las Vegas, N. Mex.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Georgetown, D. C., praying for an amendment of the charter of the Georgetown and Tenleytown Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the passage of legislation which will secure pure food and pure lard; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Lumbermen's Exchange, of Chicago, Ill., praying for the passage of the so-called naval-reserve bill; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented resolutions adopted by the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, at its twenty-second annual meeting, in favor of the passage of House bills 11027 and 11266, relative to food and lard adulterations; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of 65 citizens of O'Brien County, Iowa, praying for an investigation as to why the United States district attorney for the northern district of Iowa did not bring suit against the Sioux City and St. Paul Railway Company and the State of Iowa to recover the patents to the unearned lands of that railway company in O'Brien County, Iowa, after having been directed so to do by the Attorney-General of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Adaline Snelling, of Sutton, Vt., praying to be restored to the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of leading banks and business men of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the passage of House bill No. 5664, to increase and regulate the salaries of post-office clerks upon a system similar to that adopted in regard to letter-carriers and railway postal clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, praying for the passage of legislation "which will prevent the crime of misbranding and adulterating the food products of the country, and secure pure food and pure lard;" which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of Frederick Glover and 99 other residents of the county of Orangeburgh and voting precinct of Ayers, in the State of South Carolina, in which they state that on the 6th day of November they presented themselves at said voting precinct to vote for Presidential electors and members of Congress, and that they were denied the right to vote. They pray for an investigation into the facts stated in the petition, and that Congress will devise some means to secure to them the free exercise of the rights granted to them by the constitution of South Carolina and the laws and Constitution of the United States.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of citizens of Florida, praying for national quarantine. The petitioners state that their duties, responsibilities, and opportunities have been such that they realize the necessity for efficient quarantine to the fullest extent; and that they are also convinced that neither municipalities nor States can provide the system on that broad and comprehensive scale which the appalling danger of contagion reaching our shores from foreign lands and spreading from State to State requires. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented resolutions of the New England Historic-Genealogical Society, making certain suggestions in regard to the names of proposed new States; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of James B. Blackstone, of Worcester, Mass., praying for the payment of balance of bounty claimed by him as a veteran and of unpaid back pay; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I present the petition of William Godwin Moody and other citizens of the United States, with reference to the taking of the next census, and, as it is a matter of importance and contains valuable information, I move that the petition be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on the Census.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1297) to establish a mint of coinage at the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1805) to incorporate the Washington and Highlands Street Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, have instructed me to report the same back adversely with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, there being a House bill on the same subject now under consideration in the committee.

The report was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1637) to repeal the acts incorporating the Washington and Georgetown and Metropolitan Railroad Companies, to sell at public auction the routes of said companies, and to grant new charters for corporations to operate said routes, and thereby and otherwise to secure revenue to the District of Columbia from its street railroads, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2276) for the relief of G. H. Coryell, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5009) to provide certain arms, ammunition, and equipage to the State of Oregon, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8272) to provide for the payment of F. H. Bates as military instructor at Washington High School, District of Columbia, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2077) to provide for the supervision of the affairs of the District of Columbia by the Secretary of the Interior, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1117) relating to the record of wills in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPOONER. I am also instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1175) for the relief of the Sisters of the Holy Cross in the city of Washington, D. C., to report it adversely, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, the subject having been disposed of by another bill.

The report was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SPOONER. I am also directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1984) to incorporate the Hotel Republic Company of the District of Columbia, to report it adversely, with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. A House bill upon the same subject is now pending before the committee.

The report was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4470) to regulate the jurisdiction of the United States district judges, and of the courts over which they preside, in the State of Alabama, reported it with amendments.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3677) to open abandoned military reservations in the State of Nevada to homestead entry, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2553) to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CHACE. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report adversely the resolution recommitted to that committee relative to the claims of postmasters, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. PLUMB August 16, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate at the next session, so far as such claims have already been computed upon applications presented under the act of March 3, 1883, the amounts due postmasters and their representatives in the several States and Territories for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, the gross amount of earnings for each biennial term of service to be stated on the basis of the act of 1854, and the amount of compensation paid for the same term of service to be deducted therefrom, showing the actual difference in each case between the salary paid and the compensation computed on the basis of the act of 1854 for each biennial term of service, such report to be limited to cases in which the compensation paid is 10 per cent. or more less than the compensation already computed on the basis of the act of 1854, and to be made to the Senate from time to time as the statement covering the claims from each State shall be completed.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the resolution may go upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 3710) granting a pension to M. Josie McClain; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE introduced a bill (S. 3711) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Ann E. Gridley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3715) for the relief of the estate of Ely Moore and of Daniel Woodson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3716) granting a pension to Mrs. Caroline F. Degarmo; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3717) granting a pension to John Mickle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 3718) for the relief of Richard Oulahan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3719) granting an increase of pension to Joseph E. Rogers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3720) for the relief of W. H. Huson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3721) to grant a right of way to the Cherokee Central Railway Company through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3722) vesting in the vestry of Christ Church, Washington parish, in the District of Columbia, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to square south of square 1092 in the city of Washington, District aforesaid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 3723) for the removal of the charge of desertion against George Gregg, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 3724) granting a pension to the widow of the late Commander Samuel H. Baker, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 3725) restoring the name of Dorothea A. Anderson, formerly Dorothea Wildt, to the pension-roll; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3726) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3727) to abolish special taxes on distilled spirits and other articles subject to internal-revenue taxes at the place where such goods are delivered by the carrier to the vendee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 121) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

JOHN A. LYNCH.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate of June 7, 1888, referring the bill (S. 1363) for the relief of John A. Lynch, to the Court of Claims, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of February 7, 1884, be approved, and said claim is hereby referred to said court as of date of June 7, 1888, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883, and the act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I object, if it is to interfere with morning business.

Mr. STEWART. It is a formal matter, referring a case to the Court of Claims.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not interfere with the transaction of morning business, the Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. No debate is to follow it?

Mr. STEWART. None.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Then I do not object.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. By whom was the resolution offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. There was a report from the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session, with the suggestion that the resolution was irregular. This resolution is for the purpose of carrying out the report of the Committee on Military Affairs made at the last session referring the case to the Court of Claims.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That hereafter the Senate will hold evening sessions, and for that purpose will take a recess from 5.30 o'clock p. m. to 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the resolution be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON INDIAN TRADERS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Indian Traders be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint a messenger to serve during the remainder of the present session; such messenger to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate the usual compensation allowed to messengers of the Senate on vouchers duly approved.

WORK OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census, in conducting its investigations, is hereby authorized to employ a stenographer, and shall have power to examine experts, send for persons and papers, and to have reports of hearings and papers printed for the use of the committee, the expenses of the same to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, concurrent or other, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], coming over from a previous day.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER December 13, 1888, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this Senate will proceed to a reorganization by the election of its officers on the first day of the session after the 1st day of January, 1889.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER addressed the Senate, and concluded by offering to withdraw the resolution. [His remarks have been reserved by him for future publication. See Appendix.]

Mr. DAWES. I object.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I have no objection to the Senator from Virginia withdrawing his resolution. It is objected to by some other Senator. But I desire to say that knowing as I do that the present Presiding Officer of the Senate has performed the duties of the Chair with absolute impartiality, and as I believe in a manner eminently satisfactory to every member of this body, and believing as I do that there is no just cause of complaint in respect to any of the other officers of this body, I have sought the floor for the purpose of moving to lay the resolution upon the table and asking for the yeas and nays upon that motion. If the objection made by some other Senator is withdrawn, I enter that motion, and ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire if the resolution can be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator from Tennessee objects.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not object, but I understood that some other Senator objected. If the resolution is to be acted upon by this body I offered the motion to lay it upon the table, and upon that motion I want the yeas and nays recorded.

Mr. DAWES. I objected and made the inquiry, but if the resolution can be withdrawn without unanimous consent, that objection of course will have no effect. I sympathize with what the Senator from Tennessee has said, and designed to call the yeas and nays either upon the passage of the resolution or on a motion to lay it on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I will object, and I demand the yeas and nays upon my motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not understand the Senator's motion. Was it to lay on the table?

Mr. HARRIS. It was.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. To lay the resolution on the table?

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly what it was.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. And you want the yeas and nays on it?

Mr. HARRIS. I do.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am ready for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia withdraw the resolution? The Secretary will read the second paragraph of Rule XXI.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

2. Any motion or resolution may be withdrawn or modified by the mover at any time before a decision, amendment, or ordering of the yeas and nays, except a motion to reconsider, which shall not be withdrawn without leave.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business?

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

On page 2 of the amendment, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "ratified by Congress" and insert in lieu thereof "approved by the President of the United States."

On page 2 of the amendment, lines 22, 23, and 24, strike out the words "after said agreements of cession shall have been ratified by Congress and not before."

On page 6 of the amendment, line 4, insert, after the word "feet," the words "board measure of the pine timber thereon."

On page 6 of the amendment, line 15, insert, after "feet," the words "board measure of the pine timber thereon."

H. L. DAWES,
F. B. STOCKBRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. W. PEEL,
THOMAS R. HUDD,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DAWES. Before the report is acted on by the Senate I desire to make a statement as to its nature, because it introduces changes into the bill upon matters that were under discussion by the Senate at the time it was adopted.

The original bill, which came over from the other branch, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and a substitute for the entire bill was submitted by the Committee on Indian Affairs and was under discussion in the Senate. During the discussion of the details of the measure I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that whatever agreement or negotiation with these Indians was entered into by the commissioners provided for in this bill was to be reported back to Congress and subject to their ratification. The conferees on the part of the House have acceded to this substitute with an amendment striking out that very provision, striking out these words to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate:

And provided, That the agreements therefor shall be ratified by Congress before taking effect.

And these other words like them:

After said agreements of cession shall have been ratified by Congress and not before.

To these words I called the attention of the Senate when the bill was adopted by the Senate as a safeguard against any unwise agreement that might be made by the commissioners appointed under the bill. If the Senate do not think it wise to strike out these words, they should reject this report. The committee on the part of the Senate acceded to this request of the House to strike out these words for these reasons: The whole of the duty of these commissioners is prescribed in the statute, excepting that part of it which adjusts the line between the Indians and the United States upon one of the reservations, and says on which side of it there shall be reserved lands to be allotted to Indians in severalty and which part of it shall be open to settlement by settlers; but all agreements, as the bill is now made, are to be ratified by the Indians themselves, excepting as to one reservation, by two-thirds of all the Indians of adult age, and the rest of it by two-thirds of the adult Indians on all the reservations, and after that they are to be approved by the Executive.

Inasmuch as there was no discretion left in the bill for these commissioners, except the one of adjusting the line between that part of the reservation to be allotted in severalty and that part to be open to settlement, and their action was to be ratified by the Indians themselves and to be approved by the President, the conferees on the part of the Senate yielded to the House to have stricken out of this bill the further ratification after all that by the Congress of the United States, which could only be had at its next session.

If the Senate, however, think it unwise to intrust first to commissioners to strike the line, and then the assent of the Indians and the approval of the President of the United States—if they think it wise after that to insist upon the ratification of the agreement by Congress, as has been done in all other cases, they should reject this report, and such conferees as shall be appointed hereafter will take their instruction from this vote of the Senate.

I felt called upon to make this statement directly to the Senate because this matter was discussed in the Senate as one of the safeguards of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs;

A bill (H. R. 9163) granting a pension to Eli Garrett;

A bill (H. R. 9654) granting an increase of pension to Jesse J. Clark;

A bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Association;

A bill (H. R. 11223) to increase the pension of George A. Glover; and

A bill (H. R. 11378) granting a pension to James S. Harden.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston; and

A bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution that when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7843) granting to Citrous Water Company right of way across Papago Indian reservation in Maricopa County, Arizona, and agreed to the same.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 6922) for the relief of George W. Graham; and

A bill (H. R. 7843) granting to Citrous Water Company right of way across Papago Indian reservation, in Maricopa County, Arizona.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the revenue bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the substitute of the Committee on Finance will proceed.

The Secretary read paragraph 147, as follows:

147. Sheets or plates, of iron or steel, or taggers' iron or steel coated with tin or lead, or with a mixture of which these metals, or either of them, is a component part, by the dipping or any other process, and commercially known as tin-plates, terne-plates, and taggers' tin, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. It was understood on Thursday that this paragraph should be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas will have the opportunity of recurring to the paragraph for amendment hereafter.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes, sir. I did not understand that it was passed over. I supposed it would be considered at the present time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Do I understand that the paragraph is to be passed over?

Mr. ALLISON. I asked on Thursday, or perhaps on Wednesday, that paragraphs 145 and 147 be passed over, and I believe the request was granted.

Mr. HARRIS. That request was made because of the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. No; that related to cutlery and guns—double-barreled shotguns.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Iowa indicate to the Senate at what time he designs to take up these clauses—after the bill shall have been otherwise disposed of? Is that his intention?

Mr. ALLISON. I think very likely I shall ask the Senate to omit the consideration of these paragraphs until we have finished the reading of the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraph 148 will be now read.

The Secretary read as follows:

148. Spikes, nuts, and washers, and horse, mule, or ox shoes, of wrought iron or steel, 1.8 cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out "eight-tenths" and insert "one-half."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 555 it is proposed to strike out the word "eight-tenths" and insert "one-half;" so as to read:

148. Spikes, nuts, and washers, and horse, mule, or ox shoes, of wrought iron or steel, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. This is an article that enters into the daily use of the people of all sections of the country. It does not need the protection which is provided for in the substitute of the Finance Committee, and that fact is sufficiently evidenced from the statement that in 1887 we exported $317,675 worth of these goods, and in 1888 we increased the exports to $465,600. We are able, in other words, not only to meet the demand in the home market, but we also go abroad and compete with foreign labor in the foreign markets and sell the amount which is stated in the export-list of 1887 and 1888.

More than that, if we are, in fixing the tariff duties, to equalize the cost of labor in this country and abroad, the census of 1880 shows that the cost of making nails, spikes, horseshoes, etc., is from 19.7 to 22.3 per cent. for the labor. As a matter of course this revives the old argument, constantly recurring upon every item in this bill, which was debated the other day by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] and myself, in which he contends that we are to go back to the cost of the iron from the ground and all the intermediate processes, and that all this added to the final process constitutes the cost of the labor and should be the basis of protection. I have a table prepared by the Treasury Department showing that the cost of labor which enters into this product, in making nails, spikes, and horseshoes, is 19.7 per cent. upon nails and spikes and 22.3 per cent. upon the horseshoes. So when we look at one phase of the question or the other, whether we desire to make the protective taxes equalize the cost of labor in this country and abroad, or look to the idea of protecting domestic industries, in either phase of the question this tax is too large as reported by the committee, and ought to be that fixed in the House bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the existing rate of duty has been almost entirely prohibitory. Under the duty of 2 cents a pound levied by the existing law, the entire value of the importation for 1887 was only $92.50.

Mr. VEST. Yes, a prohibitory tax.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And as it has been stated that the exportation has been very large, it would seem to me as though the true policy to pursue in trying to fix at this time new revenue duties would be to fix the rate so as to permit competition. The competition that may come in from a reduction in the duty of only two-tenths of a cent a pound upon an article which at 2 cents a pound produced no revenue at all will be imperceptible. Under the present rate the manufacturers of this country were able to manufacture all that the country needed, and then export four or five hundred thousand dollars' worth of this product into which human labor scarcely enters at all. As the Senator from Missouri states, of the entire cost of the production the labor cost is only 19 per cent.; and now to reduce the duty only two-tenths of a cent a pound seems to me simply extravagant and preposterous. It certainly is a method of preventing any competition in this branch of industry at all, and that for articles which are in universal use among the people everywhere.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he is desirous of reducing this rate to a point where the importations shall be increased.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am in favor of reducing it to a rate that will not give the manufacturer in this country the right to charge any price he pleases upon the manufactured article to the consumer. Certainly if at 2 cents a pound there have been no importations and we have exported $500,000 worth of the product at 1.8 cents a pound, you can not expect to make very much change, certainly, as to importations. But at 1½ cents a pound, the rate proposed by the Senator from Missouri, it offers all the protection that the manufacturer can need in this country to practically secure the home market, but it does prevent them, certainly, from charging the extra half cent a pound upon their own product.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to speak in rather a deprecating tone of the fact that the American producer had not only control of our market, but was exporting goods. I understood him to say that that state of affairs will continue if the duty is reduced to 1½ cents.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then what good will it do to any one in this country or out of it to make the change?

Mr. McPHERSON. If the duty was 1½ cents the foreign competitor could only come in by paying the duty, and that affords ample protection to the home manufacturer. If the duty is fixed at 2 cents a pound the foreign manufacturer must pay the 2 cents a pound, and that gives a half cent additional protection to the manufacturer here, and he can fix his price a half cent a pound higher. It is very plain, I think, to any intelligence. Hence, if there is a disposition to make these duties absolutely prohibitory, so that there can not be any such thing as foreign competition of any kind, that is certainly in line with the rest of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island who has just interrupted the Senator from New Jersey if the present tax of 2 cents a pound is not substantially prohibitory.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand what the Senator from Arkansas means by "practically prohibitory."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I mean that the present tax of 2 cents a pound prevents any importation into this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems it did prevent any large importations in 1887. What it will do under another condition of the market I am not able to say.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Then I should like to ask the Senator to say why he thinks there would be any practical difference between that and 1.8 cents a pound. There is merely a small fraction of two-tenths of a cent difference in the amount of tax, and it seems that our exportations at 2 cents are very large and the importations practically none at all. If the committee intend to keep a prohibitory tax on this article, why not frankly say so and keep the tax at 2 cents and not make the pretense of a reduction by proposing to take off two-tenths of 1 cent a pound?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the question of the Senator from Arkansas by asking him another. The Senator from Missouri has proposed a tax of 1.5 cents. Why say 1.5 cents rather than 1.8 cents?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]?

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am just informed that I was paired by agreement in my absence with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT]. Therefore I shall decline to vote.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. DAWES. Then I withdraw my vote and stand paired with him. I should have voted "nay," and he would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DOLPH. Has the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A pair has been announced with the Senator from North Carolina. He has not voted.

Mr. DOLPH. I announce a pair with that Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] announced a pair with the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. DAWES. I was requested a moment since to pair with him. If the Senator from Oregon has paired with him, let him so stand.

Mr. DOLPH. Then I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon will be recorded in the negative, the Senator from Massachusetts being paired with the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. GIBSON. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. EVARTS (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. EVARTS. I withdraw my vote. I am paired with him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York withdraws his vote.

Mr. PASCO. I now vote "yea," the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] having come in and voted.

Mr. CALL. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], and vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Berry,	Colquitt,	McPherson,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Daniel,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Call,	Gibson,	Payne,	Walthall.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Reagan,

NAYS—21.

Aldrich,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Allison,	Hiscock,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Chace,	Hoar,	Platt,	Teller.
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Farwell,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Frye,	Mitchell,	Spooner,

ABSENT—36.

Beck,	Davis,	Hale,	Quay,
Blair,	Dawes,	Hampton,	Ransom,
Blodgett,	Edmunds,	Hearst,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Eustis,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Brown,	Evarts,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Stanford,
Cameron,	George,	Paddock,	Vest,
Chandler,	Gorman,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa,
Cullom,	Gray,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

149. Wheels, or parts thereof, made of iron or steel, and steel-tired wheels for railway purposes, whether wholly or partly finished, and iron or steel locomotive, car, or other railroad ties, or parts thereof, wholly or partly manufactured, 2½ cents per pound; and ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, or blanks for the same, without regard to the degree of manufacture, 1¾ cents per pound.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to be informed why it is that "ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, or blanks" for one purpose should bear a higher rate of duty than for another purpose. I find in paragraph 153 that steel ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, and slabs bear a duty of five-tenths of 1 cent per pound. Now, why should these ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, or blanks for car-wheels, without regard to the business or degree of manufacture—they may not be for manufacture into car-wheels at all, but come in in the ingot form—bear a duty of 1¾ cents per pound when for other purposes they bear quite a different duty? And how are you going to determine when an invoice of ingots or blooms comes to a custom-house for what purposes they are to be used? After a man has paid his duty and received his property, it would seem to me he would have a right to use that property for any purpose most conducive to his benefit; and why this inequality, so to speak, between the same quality and the same condition of manufacture for one purpose rather than for another purpose?

Again, with the perfection which this kind of industry has gained in this country, why is it that you require so much duty?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Jersey will see that this paragraph includes both iron and steel, and this class of ingots in many cases constitutes a special form. But the Senator is mistaken in saying that a discrimination is made as respects all these ingots. If he will turn to the paragraph relative to steel ingots having the value of 3 cents a pound and not above 4 cents per pound, the duty is 1.6 cents per pound; valued above 4 cents and not above 7 cents per pound, 1.6 per pound, and another class at 2 cents per pound, and so on. We propose a reduction of 45 per cent. on ingots from the present law, which we suppose, from the best investigation we could make of it, is a fair reduction.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator will take notice in this paragraph—

Wheels or parts thereof, made of iron or steel.

It is well known that for car-wheels to be lasting they can not be made of brittle iron. They must be made, and usually are made, of the simplest kind of soft and malleable iron, and then they are tired with a steel tire; and certainly unless the iron was of a soft nature it would not be possible to retain them on the wheel. I should certainly think that the duty proposed here, 2½ cents per pound, is far in excess of what there is any need to have it. It will be noticed that in all tires used in the country and wheels for all kinds of purposes, railroad wheels and other purposes, during the past year, the value of those imported was only $274,112, less than what a single railroad, very short in mileage at that, would require in its operations. It is now proposed to retain the duty at 2½ cents a pound; the existing rate of duty is to be imposed upon it.

I move to strike out, in line 560, the words "and one-half," so as to read "2 cents per pound;" and also, in line 563, I move to strike out "one and three-fourths" and insert "one and one-half." I have no objection to the vote being taken on both amendments together, and upon the question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On line 560, page 109, after the word "two," it is proposed to strike out "and one-half;" and in line 563, after the word "and," to strike out "three-fourths" and insert "one-half;" so as to read:

149. Wheels, or parts thereof, made of iron or steel, and steel-tired wheels for railway purposes, whether wholly or partly finished, and iron or steel locomotive, car, or other railway tires, or parts thereof, wholly or partly manufactured, 2 cents per pound; and ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, or blanks for the same, without regard to the degree of manufacture, 1½ cents per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the question will be put on both amendments together.

Mr. VEST. I simply want to call attention to one fact. This duty is put back from 2 cents per pound, where it is in the House bill, to 2½ cents as it is under the existing law on car-wheels. The exports for 1887 and 1888 of the first article, car-wheels, were as follows: In 1887 we exported $98,265 worth of car-wheels; in 1888, $108,282, or an increase of $10,017 worth for car-wheels of all sorts of material. There is no necessity, therefore, for maintaining this additional half cent tax. It should be stricken off and the duty reduced to 2 cents, as it is in the House bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senators on the other side of the Chamber criticised the item which has just passed from the consideration of the Senate because there were no importations, and hence they said the rate was prohibitory. Under the paragraph now under consideration fixing the duty on car-wheels the importations in 1887 were 8,581,140 pounds, of the value of $274,112. It is undoubtedly true that some kinds of car-wheels, made from paper, I think, with steel tires, were exported, but the exports were but a small fraction of the importations under the present law at the present rate of duty, 2½ cents a pound; and therefore there is a sharp competition, even at the present rates, between foreign and American producers. Under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that the American producers have hard work to retain the market, the committee were unwilling to reduce the rate. They believed the rates fixed in the paragraph were just and fair.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I see that under existing law the ad valorem equivalent to the duty on car-wheels is 78.26 per cent., and it is retained at the same in the Senate substitute for the House bill. I find in the provisions of the House bill it is reduced to 62.61 per cent. In respect to these ingots the rate of duty under the law as it now stands is 101.22 per cent. It is slightly reduced by the substitute, but the ad valorem equivalent under the provisions of the substitute is 88.57 per cent., reduced by the provisions of the House bill to 75.92 per cent. Now, there can certainly be no revenue necessity for keeping up this high rate of duty upon this class of articles, and I have heard no one assert, and I doubt whether any one will assert, that a duty of 88.57 per cent. upon the one and over 78 per cent. upon the other can be absolutely necessary as a matter of protection to the labor that is engaged in the production of these articles in this country. It seems to me there can be no reason found, either in revenue necessity or upon the idea of protection, which can justify this high rate of taxation upon these articles of absolute necessity to the business of the country.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from Tennessee will not have failed to observe during the discussion of this bill that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber have abandoned entirely any attempt to defend this tariff legislation upon the idea of protection to American labor. They have taken the broad, bold ground that the factory interests of this country shall be protected to the extent that they say is sufficient to enable them to compete with the foreign factories. I suppose, as a matter of course, labor is one of the ingredients that enter into the cost of articles; but certainly, when we have raised the question here as to the labor cost involved in all the articles upon this list, no answer can we get from that side of the Chamber with respect to that point. Labor seems to figure very lightly indeed in this discussion. It was the great interest that was concerned during the Presidential campaign which has just ended, but we hear nothing about it now. When we show that the tariff fixed upon certain articles is three times the entire labor cost of the articles, it has no influence whatever in causing a reduction of duty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New Jersey a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am hungry for light, and I am sure the Senator can give it to me if he will. Supposing a car-wheel (which I believe is the thing now under consideration) to weigh 300 pounds and to be worth $5, I would like to ask the Senator to tell me how much of that $5 and of that 300 pounds is really made up of the labor of the people who make the wheel, and how much of it is what is called raw material, although there is not any such thing in the world that comes to the use of man?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will not undertake to respond to the Senator's question by giving him a precise, definite answer as to how much of that car-wheel is labor. I know this, and I admit that the car-wheel is originally found in the ground. There is the iron ore, there is the limestone, there is the coal, all of which must be prepared at different stages of preparation. The wheel, in the end, means a great deal of labor, but here is an article that is manufactured into car-wheels that is to bear a duty of 2½ cents a pound, or something like $60 per ton. I do not think there is any preparation of that iron or any cost of its preparation, including labor and materials, in all the advanced stages of work between pig-iron, if you please, and the car-wheel, that justifies a duty of 2½ cents a pound upon the car-wheel. To do so is to simply make a prohibitory tariff upon the importation of the car-wheel.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, a car-wheel, we will assume, weighs 300 pounds—I do not know what it weighs, but that is just as good for the purpose of finding out where we are as anything else—there are 300 pounds of iron. When that 300 pounds of iron was in the bosom of the earth, what does the Senator from New Jersey, and what do all that ilk whom I call English and French and Belgium traders (without meaning the slightest offense), who prefer to have things that are made somewhere else to those that are made at home, think the 300 pounds of iron in the bottom of the mountain in New Jersey or Pennsylvania or Alabama or Minnesota or Michigan or wherever was worth? There is your raw material in the heart of a mountain, and that 300 pounds now constituting a car-wheel was probably worth as a raw material in the bosom of the earth, untouched, three-tenths of 1 cent; you may call it 3 cents if you like, and then you get above its real worth. Everything that touches the price of that car-wheel in the market and that has made it worth what it is, whether it is at Amsterdam or at Leeds or on the northern boundary of Michigan or at Pittsburgh, is the labor of man and nothing else.

The pickax that digs out your iron from the bosom of that mountain has become a pickax by the labor of man. The powder that explodes your mine and opens it is the result of the labor of man; its ultimate raw value was almost nothing at all, the willow or the elder or whatever grew by the riverside. Why, then, do our distinguished British friends—I mean it in the kindest possible way, for we are all British in a certain sense—why do our foreign traders, our free-traders, talk so much about the fact that raw material is to come in free or under a very low rate of duty in order to promote industry, when they know that in every human sense there is not any such thing as raw material? The moment it leaves the bosom of its mountain or its mine or the forest it leaves it by force of the strong hands of intelligent or unintelligent men; and every implement that they use, and without which they could not get on at all, to get it out is again the result of labor. So if a car-wheel is worth so many dollars now, 99 per cent. of those dollars is the labor that somebody has put into it. Whether the just fruit of that labor is properly divided between the laborers and the men who employ laborers is quite another question, which no tariff can touch only as it touches in the sense that the more you bring in of a foreign article made somewhere else the less there will be made in the place to which you bring it. If all the people in Washington chose to buy their shoes in Baltimore, then the shoemakers of Washington, I take it, would not have anything to do; and that is the whole of the story.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I suppose nobody takes issue with the Senator from Vermont upon the question that a great deal of labor is involved in the manufacture of a car-wheel, in the taking of the iron from the earth, and the other ingredients which go into the manufacture of a ton of iron. I never have disputed that fact. But the Senator will not fail to remember that after that iron has been mined from the earth and the iron ore has been mixed with the coal and the limestone and brought together and a ton of pig-iron has been manufactured, you put the protection upon that ton of pig-iron at $6.72.

Mr. HARRIS. On the ore itself?

Mr. McPHERSON. No; on the iron ore they impose a duty of 75 cents a ton, but on the pig-iron they impose a duty of $6.72, which they claim covers and which experience shows does cover the entire difference in the cost not only of labor but in the expensive plant required. Here are the smelting-works, the interest upon their cost, the transportation, if you please, from the different mining industries wherever they are located to bring the iron to some particular point where it can be manufactured. Now, it is proposed to impose a duty of 2½ cents a pound upon a car-wheel which is engaged in the transportation of our products. The Senator from Vermont seems to fail to remember that while we do impose a duty here which he and his party claim to be amply protective to the pig-iron, when you go to the different stages of manufacture you get in this bill away beyond the point that either capital or labor requires of protection. You impose in this very schedule a duty of 1¾ cents a pound upon ingots used for one purpose and in another schedule of the bill you impose a duty of five-tenths of 1 cent a pound on the same ingots used for a different purpose.

Now, as to the labor involved, I have heard a great deal about that, and I want to say that when you undertake to raise a duty to protect American labor in my opinion labor gets no part of the benefit at all. I claim, and I am ready to prove, and I shall prove, so far as statistics can prove it, that American labor in each and every one of these industries is as much better than foreign labor as the pay is better.

When you undertook to build up a tariff on the plea of protection to American labor, when you increased the duties, as you did in 1883, very largely upon some of the products, no sooner was the tariff bill passed than there was a reduction in wages in some of the industries of the country. Now, I want some Senator to tell me whether labor employed in any industry in this country ever got an increase of wages that was not secured through the Knights of Labor or some kindred labor organization demanding proper wages for those about them.

When you take the census of 1880, which I suppose is a fair statement—it ought to be, because it is a statement taken from the books of the factory-owners themselves as to the labor cost which enters into the manufacture of products—and when you find that the entire labor cost, for instance, in the woolen fabric is only 19 per cent., while the duty imposed in this bill upon some grades of woolens is 60 per cent., where does the difference go?

I am not disputing the fact stated by the Senator from Vermont that there is a vast amount of labor necessarily employed in bringing this iron out of the earth and getting it to a certain stage of manufacture, but I say that beyond that point the labor involved is very small indeed compared with what it is at an earlier stage of the manufacture. When you undertake with a pig of iron to manufacture something else from that iron, it is mostly done by machinery, and why the machinery in that factory should have a protective tariff of 100 per cent. imposed when the labor employed in getting the iron out of the ore receives a protection very much less than that is what I can not understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My distinguished friend from New Jersey made one remark which I think it is proper for me to take a little of the time of the Senate to answer—a very little, for I do not wish to occupy time in discussions over thread-bare subjects, but I would rather vote in order that the people may have the benefit of this bill at this session of Congress, and I do not intend to contribute so far as I am concerned to any of the discussions with the result, however our wishes may be, of having nothing done about the subject during this Congress. There is one particular point to which the Senator has referred which deserves a very brief reply, and that is his observation that there is really no difference between labor and its value in this country and in other countries, because the labor here is worth so much more as it produces so much more as to overcome the obvious and well-known difference in the actual tabulated price in general that exists between our country and the others.

So the Senator's argument is that labor is no better paid here than it is abroad, because our laborer produces so much more than the foreign laborer does, and so gets so much more price—piece-work, so to speak. I do not know whether that is true or not. I should hope it was, because I think American society, American institutions, and American atmosphere would stimulate even a foreign laborer to work with more skill and with greater industry and do more in a day than somebody does somewhere else. I hope it is so, and for this purpose I will take it to be so. Then let us assume, for the purpose of this present moment only, that the American laborer makes more for his employer for the money he gets than the foreigner does, and therefore that the real difference between the foreign price and the home price for labor is an imaginary one. Is it imaginary to the laborer himself? Will the Senator from New Jersey answer me that some day when he will not defeat the bill by answering it?

Look at the condition of the American laborer with the money he gets. If he does do more and earns more than his foreign brother laborer, what does he get for it? Go into his house in New England, or New Jersey, or Pennsylvania, or Alabama, or Michigan, or California, or anywhere else where free and intelligent and protected labor exists in this country, and then go through the similar laboring establishments and communities in Great Britain, or Germany, or France, or Austria, or Russia, or Spain if there be any there—and there are some—and compare their condition. The American laborer has a house, usually his own. He has a carpet on his floor instead of clay for the bottom of it. He has glass windows; he has a piano, or if not, an accordion or some musical instrument; he has his books; he has free schools for his children; he has paper on his walls; he has fresh meat every day if he wants it—I do not; he has butter, unless Chicago supplies him with something else—but he supposes he has butter; he has white bread; he has a place to go to church; he has everything that makes the comfort and welfare of the home. He has his vacations and his excursions. If he be honest and industrious and sober, he has everything that the richest man in America can have; and, in general, if you take all of what we call rich men in America, he is a great deal happier than they are; he sleeps better at night, and he is as well clothed, and his children and his wife are as well clothed as the richest man in America. He has everything that makes social happiness and social prosperity, if he only behaves himself and works intelligently to those ends.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will just wait until I finish this little picture I will yield.

If you will go into the manufacturing districts or the rural districts of the best governed country of Europe to-day—Great Britain or France, there may be a difference of opinion as to the internal government of those two countries, they are both well managed—or the Netherlands or Germany and compare the same class of people (and they are just as high a class from my point of view as any, and I only speak of it as a name), if you will only see it with your own eyes I do not think you will stand up in the Senate, Mr. President—I must address you—I do not think you would stand up in the Senate and say that after all there is no difference between the outcome of prosperity to the European laborer and the American laborer under what are called these consumers' taxes of the tariff, the greatest falsehood that was ever perpetrated in political nomenclature that I know of. If any Senator has not seen that, he had better take the earliest opportunity, while a Republican administration is in, and go abroad and look for himself.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is not in the habit of wandering quite so far for material for his present use as he has done to-day. He need not have gone to Europe or any other country to have found an illustration of the argument that I undertook to make in the observation I just now made.

Certainly if labor receives only one-half the duty you impose in this bill as the entire labor cost of the product, there is some part of protection that labor does not get, is there not? If the entire labor-cost in the production of woolen goods is but 20 per cent. of the value and the duty is 50 per cent., who gets the balance between 20 and 50 per cent.?

The argument I have heard in the Senate Chamber and elsewhere is that the tariff is made to protect the wages of the American laborer. Certainly you do not expect to protect his wages except by a duty representing the difference between the cost of wages paid here and those paid abroad. If labor here in the woolen industries gets double the wages it gets abroad, then 20 per cent. would represent that duty, but the duty is 50 per cent. Now, will the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator tell me how labor is to get that extra 30 per cent. protection which you give to the manufacturer? Or does the Senator from Vermont tell us that when the laboring people of this country engaged in factories have got a certain amount of comfort and luxury, so to speak, out of the increase of wages, then is the time to quit, because they have got enough? Certainly if 10 or 20 per cent. helps them very much in the increase of their rates of wages, why not give them the whole of the 50 per cent. which the tariff imposes, and if it is a tariff imposed for no purpose in the world except to protect the wages of the American laborer, why not give it to him?

I should like to have some Senator tell me how the laboring man employed in that protected factory, protected at the rate of 50 per cent., is going to get that protection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator wish an answer now?

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to get it just now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It reminds me of an illustration I heard when I was a school-boy and I presume the Senator was—I am sure he was, only he was taught in the wrong school—about a ship. Every sailor weighed 150 pounds, and there were a good many auger holes to be bored into that ship to let in the water, and if you put in too many it would sink. Sailor number one said, "I only weigh 150 pounds and I do not object to any auger hole except one that will just let in the 150 pounds that will sink me, and you may therefore bore your auger holes in that ship to the number of each sailor if you only keep it to 150 pounds apiece, and we are all safe."

That illustrates perfectly the Senator's argument. The idea, supposing it to be true, which it is not in my belief, that labor only gets as its positive income from 50 per cent. tariff 25 of it, therefore the tariff ought to be reduced to 25 per cent., is just as sensible as the school-boy's ship story that I have stated to my honorable and distinguished friend; for if you put your tariff down to the point of 25 per cent. because that is exactly what the laborer gets, it enables the foreign manufacturer and the foreign starved and reduced and slave labor, as it really is, to send to this market just so much more of their productions; and I have not lived long enough yet to believe that if I am to have two pairs of boots, and that if I get one of them in London that pair of boots is not going to be made here. Every pair of boots that I wear that is made in London is not made by somebody in the United States, and by just that much the labor of the United States is deprived of the opportunity to make boots for me. Now multiply that by sixty million on the subject of boots and shoes, and you will understand what I mean; and when you apply it to every one of the things in this whole list, the observation is of course true in exactly the same way.

If, then, you put your tariff down to what you call exactly that which the laborer gets in the combination between himself and the mine-owner, and the mill-owner, and the capital and everything—for they always ought to be friends and in combination, honest co-operation and combination as they generally are—the moment you put it down to that point, just that moment, if it does any good at all to have your free trade or your reduced tariff (and if it does not there is no use of talking about it at all), by that much just so many foreign-made goods come in, and for every hundred million dollars' worth that come and are consumed that hundred million dollars' worth do not come from our mines, our mills, and our labor, but from somebody else's, and therefore the laborer of the United States is deprived of the opportunity to earn his wages by just that much. So by this process of arithmetic and proportion you can starve the American laborer to death and say with a great Democratic flourish of trumpets, "We have given the laborer all the protection he is entitled to."

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask my Chinese friend—and of course I mean that with perfect respect, for he is Chinese in his policy only of excluding the foreign trade—I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if an American raised 2 bushels of wheat and sent them to London and bought a pair of boots, if these boots would not be made by American labor, and if he is interested in American labor, is he not interested in all kinds of American labor, or does he simply mean the labor which works in the factories in his country and not the labor that works in the fields and everywhere else outside of the protected employments?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be most glad to answer the Senator.

I mean to protect the American wheat-producer and the Vermont corn and oats and barley and cheese and butter producer to the same extent and upon the same principle that I do the man who works in the factory, of whatever kind it may be, and the Vermont farmer understands that, and I think the North Carolina one will after awhile when we get to peanuts and a few things of that sort. The Vermont farmer understands—perhaps he is mistaken. and if my friend will come up there and teach us better we should like to have him do it—that if he can sell his wheat or his rye or his barley or his oats or his butter or his cheese or his pork or his bacon or his beef or whatever he raises to a man who lives within 5 miles of him and gets twice the price that he would after paying freight, etc., if he sent his butter and his cheese, etc., to Liverpool or London or Paris or wherever, and he pays once and a half as much as he would for the same thing if he got it from London—and then it would not wear half as long, as I have found out by experience—he is doing a good thing. The Vermont farmer knows that the protection of manufactures of everything that everybody makes or wears or uses or eats or drinks is for the universal benefit, and that it helps him as much as it does the very man upon whose car-wheels a tariff duty is imposed. That is the way we understand it.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Vermont is made with his usual ingenuity, but it lacks one or two essential elements. The price of that Vermont farmer's wheat, butter, etc., is fixed by the surplus in this country that goes to Liverpool, and he is compelled to sell at the free-trade prices of the world; or, on the other hand, when he comes to buy anything from the factories in that country he is compelled to buy in the restricted prices of this home market, this blessed home market, which is fenced in by this high protective wall.

If the farmer in Vermont can stand that and thinks he is improved by being compelled to sell his products in the open free-trade market in unrestricted competition with all similar articles grown all over the world, and is compelled to buy in return from his neighbor, because he is his neighbor, under the impression that his neighbor for his accommodation will eat a little more to encourage the home market and will surfeit himself to the point of losing his health in order to increase the capacity of the home market—I say if the Vermont farmer is satisfied with that, the North Carolina farmer is not, and it seems to me that nobody else who is blessed with a gift of good, hard, common sense would be satisfied with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be true, Mr. President, if it were true, but unhappily, so far as the Vermont farmer is concerned—I do not know how it is in North Carolina—it is not true.

Mr. VANCE. Is not the price of wheat in Vermont fixed by the price abroad?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not by a long deal.

Mr. VANCE. You do not raise any, perhaps, but buy all you use.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, we raise wheat and we raise corn and we raise a good many things, and we have got on without calling upon the National Government for any great aid in any direction so far, and we have got on in the belief that we are doing very well under what is called a protective tariff, and the higher the protection the better for us.

Mr. VEST. Would the Senator object to stating how much wheat his State raises?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would not object if I knew. I do not know.

Mr. VEST. I think it is 300 or 400 bushels, possibly. I recollect Rhode Island raises about 200 bushels.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will call it 400 bushels just for the fun of it, and I suppose that 400 bushels, unless it was rather rare, would not bring any greater price than if it were 400,000 bushels, as it has to compete with the free-trade markets of the world, as the Senator from North Carolina says.

Mr. VEST. You do not export any.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course we do not export any, because we have got a home market; and when the United States builds up its own industries of every kind so that it can consume all or nearly all of everything that every farmer produces, then so much the better for the United States, and by just so much as you bring in for consumption in this country foreign-made articles, by that much you diminish the consumption of the home-made articles, do you not, wheat included? And if you do not find somebody in the United States who can earn money to buy wheat, how is he going to be able to consume it? But if you give him employment, develop the boundless resources that Missouri much more than Vermont has in her natural gifts, employ the citizens of Missouri in making the things that their neighbors want, they will have earned the money to buy the wheat of the Missouri farmer, and they will grow and prosper as they have always under that system.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, in what the Senator from Vermont presents there is mixed up a good deal of truth with a very great fallacy—a fallacy which has done a great deal to mislead the public mind on this very subject.

The Senator assumes as the basis of his argument, and one of the grounds of his support of this bill, that by encouraging domestic manufactures we furnish home markets for agricultural products.

If it were true that the country could consume manufactures to the extent of the value of the farm products, there might be reason in the argument presented by the Senator from Vermont; but when we remember that during the last year, after supplying the manufacturers and all other people who consume the farm products of this country, we exported to foreign markets five hundred and twenty-three million and some odd thousand dollars of farm products which could not be consumed in this country, and for which there was no market in this country, we shall see the fallacy of the argument which he presents.

It is true that as we build up manufacturing establishments it tends to that extent to furnish markets; but that is not the proposition of the Senator. It is that it does furnish the market, when we see by notorious and official facts that it only furnishes a market for a portion of the agricultural products of this country, and that the portion not so consumed gave 74½ per cent. of all the exports from this to foreign countries. Now, what are we to do with these exports? Build up more manufactories? Why, sir, by the high bonus given to manufactures through protective tariffs we have encouraged the investment of money in manufactures, and have encouraged the construction of machinery and manufacturing establishments to such an extent that they can not be run continuously, because they have to rely in the main upon the American market, as we have got things in such a condition under our tariff legislation that we can not command the markets of foreign countries, and, having to rely upon the markets of our own country, we have machinery enough and capital enough engaged in manufacturing to supply two such countries as this. The result is one of those evils that come from vicious and bad legislation, that this capital for a portion of the year must lie idle. This machinery must lie idle, and thousands of laborers engaged in these vocations after the market is stocked are deprived of labor and left to starve, or beg, or steal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator, then, what would be the advantage to the general interests if we are overproducing manufactured articles now so that they have to lie idle, to throw the doors wide open to bring in more manufactured articles of the same kind from foreign countries?

Mr. REAGAN. That turns the matter into a new subject that I will not now go into. I am not surprised that the Senator desires to get off the subject we are on to a new one, because the failure of the one he is on is a palpable, demonstrated failure, to which there is no answer.

If we get a tariff which will prohibit imports, which will exclude imports from our country, what are we to do with the five or six hundred million of surplus agricultural products that form the great body of the exports in this country? Are they to rot in the field? If so, that will not only beggar agriculture, but will bankrupt this country. These very agricultural exports give us our balance of trade, as it is called, which we have been enjoying for several years, and has given us that increase of surplus gold in the Treasury which has been accumulating from 1878 until now.

So there is no way of justifying a tariff simply on the ground that it will exclude foreign imports. A prohibitive tariff is one thing, a tariff that will protect domestic labor is another thing. If we desire to protect labor, you only want, as was suggested by one of the Senators on this side of the Chamber, to give such a rate of duty above the other elements of cost as will place the American product on an equal footing with the product of foreign countries. We do not stop at that, but we go on creating a system of monopolies. Not content with a single monopoly, we propose to make a monopoly—it is a monopoly in a sense; of course it is not in the hands of one person, but in the hands of several persons—a monopoly in every particular branch of manufacturing industry and a monopoly at the expense of the agricultural interest of this country, which employs much the larger part of the laboring people of this country, and employs nearly two billions of capital, a larger amount of capital than any other business unless it may be railroading, a larger number of laborers than any other business is to be placed at the mercy of the manufacturers in order that they may exclude imports and place the price of their manufactures at whatever figure they choose to make. That is the logic of it.

But, Mr. President, I think while we may demonstrate these things that it is idle to argue. It is clear that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber are as impervious to reason on this subject as the manufacturers, who are the beneficiaries of this vicious and bad legislation, who are the beneficiaries of the oppression that is made to rest upon the large majority of the American people, and which has rendered their vocation profitless and has placed it in such a position that none of the rising generation of young men will engage in agriculture if they can get any other employment, simply because it is taxed to death and to dishonor in order that that interest may be flagitiously plundered by the manufacturing interest. We may demonstrate these things, but however they may be demonstrated we can not hope to secure an amendment of this outrageous bill so as to reduce it to principles of justice and reason and fair dealing, and so I do not think it is very profitable to show the fallacies, the wrong, and injustice of such a measure.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question for information about the position that I understood him to assume a few moments ago. I am not sure that I understood the effect of what he said, and so I would like to ask him a question for my own information. I understood him to say, in reply to a proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, that even admitting that the cost of labor in any given article was 25 per cent. and the tax on that article was 50 per cent., that would not be wrong within itself, the effect of which would be to declare that a system of tariff taxation which would fully compensate manufacturers for all the labor they employed and more besides would be justified in this system of Government in this country. Did the Senator mean to take that position? I simply ask for information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I meant to state the very fact, as I think it was, that I did; but I did not mean to say and did not say and never intend to say, until I get a good deal more light or darkness than I have now, that it is a tariff taxation in the sense the Senator from Arkansas refers to it at all—far from it. The additional 25 per cent., as I undertook to illustrate (and I think that most gentlemen understood it, because nobody has attempted to answer the illustration), is not a wrong to the consumer or a burden upon him; but the point is to protect the home market, not only of the manufactured article, but of food, which is also a manufactured article, to be sure, of every kind that the people eat, except it may be raw lettuce or something of that kind; and then when you take the garden utensils and the labor of keeping your garden in order lettuce is a manufactured article. When you take the consumption of food, of the products of the farm, it is larger per capita in the United States than in any other country in the world. When you are protecting the work of the man who makes the articles that earn him the money to buy that food with, you are protecting the market of the food producer.

That is the way the farmers of Vermont understand it, and they think they understand it. If the farmers of Arkansas do not I am sorry for them, because the Senator must see, as the Senator from Texas has said or appeared to say (I do not know that he intended that result, but it was the necessary consequence of what he did say), the production of manufactured articles in this country is too great, and therefore the door ought to be opened to introduce the manufactured articles of other countries. If the production is too great and you introduce the manufactured articles of other countries, by just so much you diminish the manufacture of articles in this country and their consumption. If you want to do that we can understand it, and if it is for the benefit of the greatest interest in the United States, and that is the farming interest, so be it; but if it be to the detriment of that interest then it ought not to be done. I think it is to the detriment of that interest.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With great pleasure.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not mean to be understood as the Senator supposes I might have been understood, that I desired to provide for the introduction of foreign manufactures into this country. The view which I had was that I desired to prevent the adoption of a tariff which would enable domestic manufacturers not merely to sell their wares at a reasonable price, but to put several prices on them and compel other people to pay them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator does not wish to have Americans consume foreign articles except so far as to make home-made articles reasonable in price. Is that the proposition?

Mr. REAGAN. That would be about my view.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is about the Senator's view. Very well; let us see where we stand now. The Senator then agrees that every foreign machine, and every foreign pair of boots, and every foreign pound of butter, and every foreign pound of cheese, and every foreign gallon of wine or whatever comes from abroad, every foreign yard of silk that comes in and is consumed here, displaces by so much the product of his own country in the hands of some citizen or citizens.

Mr. REAGAN. And I will add that it ought to do it, unless the holder or the maker of that product will sell it at a reasonable price.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Grant it for the sake of the argument, Mr. President, most decidedly. Now the question is, how is the home producer to get an unreasonable price? The Senator says it is a monopoly. What does he mean by a monopoly? Is there any grant by Congress or by the Legislature of any State to a particular set of men to produce to the exclusion of any or all other citizens any single commodity in this world or this continent? There is not except the patent laws, and I take it the tariff is not largely interested in the patents or the patents in the tariff.

Leaving out the patents for inventions, which the Constitution, made by the fathers, provided for—to be sure the fathers were very weak and ignorant men compared with those we have about us now—there is nothing within the United States, which embraces the best part of a continent, that one man may not engage in the production of just as well as another. There is no one place in the United States where any particular commodity or production can come to have a monopoly, because there are a thousand other places in the United States where the same mine, the same land, the same forest, the same water power, the same steam mill, the same genius, and the same industry can engage in it the moment there is a margin for the wife and the children and the old age to go into that business.

There is free trade in the United States and among the United States, and there always ought to be. With a boundless and inexhaustible resource of material, of industry, of skill, of capital, in every State, even those that have been made desolate in point of money for the time being—a very unfortunate occurrence—capital for any enterprise that will pay a margin to labor and to the capital invested (and capital is nothing but labor stored up, as the Senator knows perfectly well), is open to everybody. The possibility of a monopoly in the United States as between the owners of what is called the raw material, the mine, or the forest, or the earth, or the field, or the farm, or the shop, can not exist, and it does not exist, and it never will exist until the Government itself becomes a great monopoly, which I hope will never happen.

The consequence is—and there is no evading it or dodging it—that every effort of our friends on the other side to stimulate and increase the importations of things to be consumed in this country by its people (and that is the point of cutting down your duties; otherwise we are talking about nothing at all; clearly we are talking about nothing if that is not the point), is an effort to diminish by so much the things that the people of this country produce, and that applies as well to the farm as it does to the shop.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I desire to say one word in addition to what I have said, and in response to the position just assumed by the Senator from Vermont, which is that there can be no monopoly in manufactures in this country because the privilege is open to all people in all parts of the country to engage in them. While theoretically that may be true, is it practically true? Already under the influence of high protection the manufacturing capital has been concentrated in a particular part of the country. Now that levies tribute upon the other parts of the country to the average rate of 47 per cent. on such articles as are taxed imports. How is the West, how is the South to engage in manufacturing and compete with old establishments? How are they to get capital to do this when a tribute is levied upon them of 47 per cent. on all they purchase of such articles as are taxed imports? Their substance is drained. There is no possibility of their accumulating capital for such a purpose.

It is that very fact which renders it impossible—not impossible, but impracticable—to establish and carry on manufacturing establishments in the West and South, where the people are taxed to support Eastern manufacturers, while the plants already established in the East and the wealth accumulated there enable them to go forward with their business, and where they have experts in the various branches of manufacturing industry.

If the burden was reversed, if by some possible law we could tax the East, the manufacturing States, for the next ten years from 30 to 50 per cent. of their purchases and transfer that capital to the West and South then we could manufacture all over the West and South. But we can not do that when we are unable to accumulate capital because of a system wisely and intentionally devised to draw away from the people of those portions of the country their surplus capital.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. In one moment. That very system is shown from official reports to have created the vast increase of the wealth of the manufacturing States as compared with the agricultural States, and not only the increase of wealth in their own States, but the immense amount of property which they own in the non-manufacturing States, including the hundreds of millions of dollars for which Western and Southern farms are mortgaged under a policy which plunders them for the benefit of the manufacturing interests. Now I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has referred to the manufacturing capital and influence of the East. I should like to ask him if he is not aware, as statisticians and philosophers of social progress would put it, that the center of the manufacturing industry in the United States now is west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. REAGAN. If it is, it is news to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is. And then I should like to ask the Senator on the subject——

Mr. REAGAN. It is in what? In the woolen manufacture? In the cotton manufacture? It is possible that the iron manufacture may be nearly as great, but I have not understood that even the iron manufactures are near as great in the West as east of the Alleghanies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Texas, who I know is perfectly sincere and to whom I always listen with the greatest pleasure, will pardon me for a moment in interruption, I wish to tell him, what I am informed from some study and examination and from true sources of evidence is true, that there is not any East, that there is not any West on the subject of manufactures, and that there is almost not any South. There was a great difference between the South and the North in that, for the reason that the South stuck to the delusion, if my friend will pardon me, as I think it is that he is laboring under, and only wanted to cultivate what they thought was the agricultural benefit of their country and did not engage in manufactures. Although they had the material under their own feet and within the reach of their arms they chose to trade abroad with their king, cotton, until they reduced themselves to the condition the Senator says, that the capital is not there.

But suppose it is not there, for a moment, Mr. President. In this United States, if we are one country and one people, as I believe we are, or are going to be very soon, capital in one part of the country goes where it can find the most profitable employment. I suppose in the last ten years in the Southern States (and I only speak of them now in point of mere geography as the body of States that pursued a different policy heretofore in regard to manufactures), the capital in the last ten years in those States has come very largely in its investment in manufactures and productions and enterprises for social welfare and development from the North and from the East. But what of it? If the people of the South did not want capital, if they did not want their lumber cut up, if they did not want their railroads built, if they did not want their iron establishments built up at Atlanta, their cotton at Augusta, and their iron at Birmingham, the States could have refused to grant charters of incorporation, as I suppose they mostly have. If they did not want to do that sort of thing they could freeze them out; but they do want it.

If there is any advantage in New England, or Pennsylvania, or Iowa, or Illinois, or California in developing every kind of industry in the State, there is a similar advantage in Texas, and in Louisiana, and in Alabama; and all the money is as free to go from one part of the country to another as in Vermont where there was an opportunity to develop production and industry.

I am surprised to hear my friend, whom I so much respect, allude, as if it were an injurious or a censorious thing, to the fact that capital has accumulated in the North and East and has not accumulated in the South, when it is so ready to go there to help build it up.

Mr. REAGAN. I agree with the proposition of the Senator from Vermont that capital will go wherever it is best rewarded. That is a law of trade, a law of commerce which we all understand. But when it is restrained and controlled by laws which transfer it without price and without consideration from some classes of people to others, and from some parts of the country to others, the law which the Senator refers to has no application, or very little application. He leaves out of sight the great difficulty which I presented, that we are operating under a system which is transferring by the hundred millions of dollars a year the capital from some parts of the country to other parts.

The Senator refers to the fact that a system prevailed in a portion of the States which was unfriendly to manufactures. I think it was the misfortune of that portion of the country that the Senator's statement is true; that there was a time when agriculture commanded most attention, and when manufactures did not command the degree of attention that a wise system of political economy called for. That day, I am gratified to say, has passed, and now what we want, in order to enable us to manufacture, is to have an equal and fair chance and reasonable means of starting in the world, and not to have the surplus capital of that portion of the country year by year drawn away from the people and concentrated where the manufacturing interest prevails.

I must repeat that I would always question with a great deal of hesitancy any matter of fact stated by the Senator on account of knowing his careful methods of investigating everything, but it is news to me, it is somewhat singular news to me, that the center of the manufactures of this country is to be found west of the Alleghanies. I know of no single branch of manufacturing industry that I think of at this time that, so far as my information goes, has its center west of the Alleghanies.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, in the colloquy between the Senator from Vermont and myself a few moments ago he denied that the price of the farmers' products was fixed by the price which obtained abroad. I desire to offer him some good Republican authority upon that subject. I desire to offer him the authority of the chairman of the subcommittee, who has this bill in charge, the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I read from a speech of his delivered in the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what year?

Mr. VANCE. In the year 1870. The time being the essence of the argument, I suppose the "statute of lamentations" will be pleaded upon him. [Laughter.] Said the Senator from Iowa:

> What is true of wheat is equally true of other grains. Therefore the farmer has practically no protection at all, and whatever benefit he derives is from what the home market furnishes for home products. Unfortunately for the farmer the market price of wheat is fixed by the price which the surplus will bring abroad, or the price of wheat in London or Liverpool. At that market, where the surplus is sold, and which fixes the value of the whole crop, he comes in competition with the grain produced in the Crimea, in Hungary, and in the region of the Baltic, from fields cultivated by what is known, in comparison with our own, as pauper labor.
> But I am told we must so legislate as to furnish a home market for all our agricultural products, and this can only be done by high tariff. Any one examining the subject will see that our agricultural products increase more rapidly than our population, so that if we do not export these products in their natural condition we must do so by converting them into manufactured articles and export these articles. But this can not be done under a high tariff, for all nations will buy manufactured products where they are the cheapest, and the nation selling the cheapest will control the market. This rule excludes our highly-taxed manufactures made from highly-taxed materials from the markets of the world, although we have natural advantages possessed by no other nation.

So it would seem, Mr. President, that if it was a heresy of mine I am in tolerably respectable company when I am in company with the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee who has this bill in charge. He says that any one examining the subject will be forced to come to the conclusion which he has arrived at. Therefore, I take it for granted that the Senator from Iowa believes that the Senator from Vermont has not examined this subject, and until he does examine it with a view to elicit the truth, I would advise him to hold his peace.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that challenge, Mr. President, I shall not hold my peace, for the Senator is wrong.

The Senator has gone back eighteen years (and I wonder he did not go back a hundred to find somebody who had said something of the sort a hundred years ago) to quote the Senator from Iowa as proving that at the present time the home market for farm products in the vicinity where they are raised is governed by the prices of farm products in London or Liverpool.

Perhaps the Senator from Iowa was right at that time and perhaps he was wrong. It is very rare that he has been wrong since I have had the pleasure to know him, but I think that is one of the times when possibly he was. But whether right or wrong then, I wish the Senator from North Carolina would show us the statistics of the price of sweet potatoes, for instance, in North Carolina, or tobacco, or whatever North Carolina raises, to the consumer in the cities and towns in North Carolina, and the prices that they bore to the consumer in the cities and towns in Great Britain.

I know from my own individual experience what I pay; and this case may be like that of the blind man who was made to see, as it was stated in the Scripture; and when the Pharisees or whoever stated to him that it was impossible on logic or what somebody had said among the prophets before, he replied, "I was blind and now I see." My own experience is, from personal knowledge, that the price I pay as a consumer in the rural and agricutural State of Vermont (and substantially it is nothing else, quite as much so as North Carolina) for the articles that I consume in my family is not regulated at all by the Liverpool and the London price, but is a great deal more; and it is a great deal more in the same sense that an English manufacturer of 10,000 tons of steel finding that the English market will not take the last 1,000 tons sends it to New York and sells it for the cost of its production merely to get rid of it, as a merchant in a country store sells the last year's remnant for half what it cost him; and he makes money by that. That is what I find. When I pay 30 cents a pound for good butter at Burlington, Vt., I find that what is called good butter in the Liverpool and London markets sells for 25 or 20 cents, or whatever it may be; and so on with everything.

But however that may be, Mr. President, on the theory of my distinguished friend from North Carolina there is no escaping from the point that our friends on the other side are so careful never to reply to or allude to, that by just so much as you can stimulate the consumption among sixty million people of the things that the sixty million people as farmers raise, the nearer home it is sold the less the cost of transportation, and the more money you can furnish to the consumer, the laboring man in the factory or the shop, or on the railroad, or in the store, or wherever else to buy it with, the more he will buy and the higher price he will pay. Our Democratic friends are amazingly shy of saying anything about that.

Mr. VANCE. Perhaps the Senator from Vermont was talking of one thing while I was thinking of another. My comparison of prices did not refer to the produce of a kitchen garden or the perishable vegetables which are used from day to day, but to the staple articles which bear transportation abroad.

The Senator asks me to give him something from North Carolina the price of which is regulated by the foreign quotations. I beg leave to say to him that sweet potatoes, to which he alluded, are, I believe, an article that does not bear transportation. They are so perishable in their nature that I do not know of a bushel of sweet potatoes having been transported across the ocean for sale. But we raise 400,000 bales of cotton; and I can say to the Senator that I have seen the operations of the cotton dealers in most of the towns of North Carolina, and they are the same in all, and that every morning regularly the cotton dealer receives from New York the Liverpool quotations of cotton, and those quotations regulate his purchases for the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose the Senator had his way and had absolute free trade, or a mild and bland free trade, or whatever you call it, where does he think the market would be that would regulate the price of cotton then?

Mr. VANCE. I should like to retort to the Senator from Vermont in the fashion of his country and answer his question by asking him another. Suppose we were to carry out his idea and forbid all foreign trade and make it a crime and a penitentiary offense to exchange with or to buy anything from a foreigner, where would he derive money to support the Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator's question, even before he answers mine, because I see he does not wish to answer it.

Mr. VANCE. I will attend to my friend's question later in the day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, a good deal later, I am afraid. [Laughter.]

In the first place, the case that the Senator supposes does not exist, and never will. I am not proposing any law against importations or exportations. But if we had an absolute prohibitory law against the importation of any article into the United States whatever, you have a continent and that continent would furnish the means of consumption and of production just in as large a degree as it does now. I beg the Senator not to understand that I am for that at this present moment or will be for a considerable time to come, because the laws of nature, if we can get the ill-nature of the Democratic party out of the way, will bring it around even in a little while, and within fifty years the continent in this country composed of the United States of America will regulate the prices of everything in the world, because they will have developed their own productions by their own home markets and their own home industries and their own farms and their own wealth in such a way that they will be the masters of the situation, as every free country like ours ought to be.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I confess I do not understand the Senator from Vermont. He says he has been arguing all the time to show how injurious any importations were, and that an importation to any extent of a given article displaces to that extent the manufactured article at home and to the public injury. Therefore is he not necessarily and argumentatively in favor of preventing that which operates to the public injury? Is he not in favor of stopping everything that is imported by placing a condition so that it can not come in? It seems so to me.

If the Senator will have the kindness to ask his question again, as it has escaped me, I will try to answer him before it is protested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that the question has escaped the Senator, but I thought the Senator wished to escape the question. [Laughter.] It is a little different way of putting it.

My question was: Suppose we had the free trade my honorable friend believes in, where would be the ruling market of cotton if we were to abolish all the customs laws to-day? Would it be in New York, or Wilmington, or Charleston, or Savannah, or would it be Liverpool, just as it is now?

Mr. VANCE. It would be in Liverpool, just as it is now, until New York became the great commercial center of the world, as London is now, and then we should make those quotations for ourselves.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then a change in the tariff would not help us on that point.

Mr. VANCE. What I object to in the position of the Senator and his associates on that side is that whether free trade is right or wrong, or whether protection is right or wrong, it is certainly wrong and unjust to compel one class of his fellow-citizens to submit to free trade for their articles which they have to sell and to submit to a restrictive market for all which they have to buy. We must either have free trade that will go all around, or we must have protection that will go all around, if you want to be just and do right by all classes of our people. So it seems to me that in either event the logic of the position is against the Senator and his side of the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to weary the Senate with continuing this discussion so long, but on the very point my friend from North Carolina has just alluded to, of equality, to which I entirely agree, I should like to ask him what his views are on the subject of a tariff on rice, for illustration?

Mr. VANCE. Does the Senator want an answer now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. VANCE. I would let rice share the fate of every other article in the country. If there was universal free trade, rice would be free. If there was protection, rice should come in for its share. That is equality all around, is it not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I agree to entirely, but while the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber will vote for a due and full protection for rice, I am very much afraid that my honorable friend will vote against nearly every other article but rice.

Mr. VANCE. Perhaps the Senator's honorable friend will show him what he will do with respect to getting over the bridge when we arrive at the bridge. The question is now, I arraign you and that side of the Chamber, as avowed by the policy of this bill and by the argument you make upon this floor, with the intention of forcing one class of the community to submit to an injustice and a hardship which the other is not compelled to submit to. As was explained here the other day, to illustrate what I mean, it is impossible by any kind of affirmative legislation to encourage the industry engaged in the production of cotton, but you can encourage that industry by withholding some of the taxes which are imposed upon the ties that bind the cotton baled for market; but the Senator and his party to a man voted squarely against any relief upon that portion of the production of cotton.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought my honorable friend had finished.

Mr. VANCE. I have no doubt the Senator hoped so. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rather think I do. [Laughter.] I must justify myself to my distinguished friend from North Carolina on the cotton-tie question, although that is not one of the ties that bind all our harmonious and homogeneous country together, I hope. I voted against the reduction on cotton-ties upon the ground that I believed (and I think human experience has demonstrated it to be true in general as it regards other matters), if we put cotton-ties on the free-list the cotton-raiser in the State of North Carolina and every other State where cotton is raised and baled would have to pay just as much for his cotton-ties as he did before; and in a short time, when it was made apparent to the foreign makers of cotton-ties that the policy of the United States was not to have that sort of thing made in this country at all, the price would rise; and I intended to save the cotton-raiser from himself.

Mr. VANCE. So the Senator voted then in the interest of the farmer?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did.

Mr. VANCE. To keep the price as low as possible by putting the duty as high as possible?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it.

Mr. VANCE. That is it. [Laughter.] That is the argument, sir. That is the politico-economical chestnut that I have heard for the last forty years, and which I expect to continue to hear so long as it is necessary in the interests of the manufacturing classes to maintain the advantage which unfortunately they have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The prices of all home-made articles, the more they were protected, so as to stimulate and encourage production, have gradually and regularly fallen; and wherever you put the monopoly into the hands of the foreign producer that monopoly will raise the price as fast as it can, which is perfectly natural.

We have so long followed the delusion which was stated in the President's message very broadly and fairly a year ago, that the customs duty is a tax upon the consumer, that I suppose some gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber really believe it; and yet our experience has been, account for it as you may, the hard fact has been that in the most prominent instances where we have put foreign articles upon the free-list the consumer substantially has not gained by it at all.

Mr. VANCE. Quinine, for instance?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, quinine, for instance. I am quite ready to discuss the question of quinine with the Senator, if he likes, but I will take a thing that he is more familiar with, as he is evidently not a malarial subject and drinks more coffee than he takes quinine. We took what is called the tax on the consumer (it is stated so in the President's message) off of coffee about the year 1870, about the time of the speech of the honorable Senator from Iowa to which the Senator from North Carolina has alluded. We first reduced it 3 cents on the pound, from 5 cents to 2 cents. From Brazil comes, I suppose, six-tenths of all the coffee that is consumed by the people of the United States. The American minister at Rio immediately informed the State Department and the President of the United States and his country officially that the price of coffee rose in Brazil accordingly, and the price, if the Senator will look at the price-lists in the New York markets and in the retail markets all over the country, did not diminish a bit. Two or three years afterwards we put coffee on the free-list entirely. Again the price of coffee rose in the foreign markets just in proportion, and the American consumer paid just what he did before, and the Treasury of the United States was out about $10,000,000 a year that went to pay the taxes, if you call them that, the expenses of the Government, the burdens of the people; and the people got no benefit from it, but the foreigner did.

You can account for that by all sorts of reasoning. I know some gentlemen who are very astute at reasoning, and some of them are within my eye now, who will say it was this reason and that; it was in the hands of a syndicate and all that; but the simple and the hard truth remains, and there is no getting away from it, that when coffee was first reduced in customs duties to 2 cents a pound, and then put on the free-list three years afterwards, the American consumer continued to pay what he did before, or more, not for that reason, but according to general production, etc., and the Treasury of the United States whose money was to pay the expenses of the people of the United States was out of pocket just that much. Now, you may argue, you may reason, you may theorize, you may account for it, but there is the fact.

Mr. VANCE. Does not the Senator know that Brazil immediately put an export duty on coffee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly the reverse.

Mr. VANCE. I think the Senator ought to have stated that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to have stated it if it had been true, but it was not true.

Mr. VANCE. Does the Senator say that Brazil did not put an export duty upon it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They did not.

Mr. VANCE. Then why has the Senator submitted to see people pay an enhanced price for coffee for eighteen years and deprived the Treasury of all that revenue for all this time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that I have, but I could not help it. There were too many people on the other side.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator has never tried to help it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ought to state that the Senator should look at the reports in the State Department on this subject of the export duty. It would not help us out of it a bit if it were true, because the American consumer did not gain anything and the Treasury lost; but the truth was, as it appears from the official records in the State Department (and I have copies of them downstairs so that I know exactly, or I think I do, what I am talking about), that when our duty upon coffee was reduced to 2 cents a pound the Brazilian export taxed us so much, I have forgotten how much, call it 1 cent a pound, if you please. It was not changed in any particular. When coffee was put on the free-list it remained the same. It has remained the same ever since unless it may be within a year or two; I do not know how that is, but it has remained the same ever since for all practical purposes except that in one instance it has been reduced instead of increased, and the Senator will find in the official records of the Government, most of them in print, and in the documents within our reach now, that fact.

Mr. VANCE. Yet it seems that the Senator and his party associates have submitted to this imposition of increased price of coffee upon the people for eighteen years, and this deprivation of the money in the Treasury for the same length of time, simply because the imposition of that much revenue on an article that would not compete with anything in this country would, perhaps, furnish some excuse for taking down the revenue on those articles which did compete. That is the argument of his party, that those things which are not produced in this country must all be made free and the duty must be imposed upon those things which are produced in this country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the argument at all, Mr. President.

Mr. VANCE. That is the argument of the Senator's associates, at all events, now right within his hearing. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] enunciated that doctrine not six months ago in this Chamber, and it has been again and again proclaimed to be the doctrine of the Republican party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; the Senator from Ohio, as I understood him, has announced no such doctrine. But the Senator from North Carolina has escaped from his "tariff-for-revenue" argument and from his free-trade argument by going into a reproach of the Republican party for taking off the duty from coffee because it did not benefit the consumer and did injure the Treasury. However, the Republican party did not do it. It was done by universal consent, following the delusion that the Senator from North Carolina, with great respect to him, is, I think, still laboring under, that every dollar of a customs duty imposed upon an imported article is a tax upon the consumer.

That turned out in respect of millions of dollars and a commodity of enormous consumption by everybody, to be untrue; and you may follow it through. The reciprocity treaty with Canada of 1854, made in good Democratic times, put a great variety of Canadian products, all of them in fact of that country, upon the free-list, and I have yet to see it stated, much less proved, even as to lumber, the greatest possible of Canadian importations into the United States, that the consumer of lumber on the plains of Kansas or Iowa got his lumber any cheaper; and when in 1865 that treaty expired and the Canadian products were again put upon the dutiable-list, the price did not rise.

So you may go on through all the great mass of experience. There are some apparent exceptions, though they are not real ones. There are apparently some exceptions to that rule, but in the main it may be safely stated that so far as the consumer in the United States is concerned the imposition or the taking off of a customs duty does not affect him. It affects the profit of the foreign producer and importer more or less, and the consumer's price rises or falls according to the general bulk of supply and the general quantity of demand. Just as in the case of any farm in North Carolina or Vermont, if the tax on whatever it happens to be that falls upon a farm in one year is greater or less, the price of the farmer's potatoes, his corn, his wheat, his oxen, his horses, whatever he has to sell does not rise or fall according to the tax that is imposed on his land or upon his personal property, but it rises or falls upon entirely different principles, and the tax merely diminishes his profit as it is increased.

Mr. VANCE. I thought before the Senator concluded he would relieve the impression his remarks made that I was complaining that there was no duty upon coffee. I certainly said no such thing, and he will see that one of his remarks was so framed as to convey that impression. He himself said that relieving coffee of duty had increased the price and had deprived the Treasury of a great amount of revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I did not say it had increased the price. I said the price was increased, but it was not increased on account of taking off the tax.

Mr. VANCE. Very well; the Senator said the price was increased after taking off the tax; that the price went up, the consumer was damaged, and the Treasury was damaged by the loss of revenue. I ask him why he and his friends, if that were the case, had not restored the duty upon coffee, and in reply to that he says I complain that we have not put the duty upon coffee, that I want coffee taxed, etc.

Now, sir, I shall take my seat, declining to go into any further discussion when it comes to the point which seems to be asserted here, that the whole object of these manufacturers in respect of these duties upon every object of human consumption and of human necessity is simply to cheapen the article for the benefit of the consumer. When the argument assumes that form it is time that a man who has any desire to protect his reputation for logic should be silent.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in an article published, I think in the Forum, some time ago selected coffee as an illustration of the fact that removing the duty did not cheapen the article imported into this country. I undertake to say, and I will prove it by the statistics, that coffee is an exception to the rule, that the imposition of a duty does increase the price to the consumer. Coffee is the most speculative article known to the commercial world. It fell last week in New York sixty points in a single hour, and it regained forty points in a single hour on the day succeeding.

Coffee for years has been under the control of a Portuguese syndicate, a syndicate that has controlled absolutely the price of coffee to the entire world. But a few years ago a citizen of New York was called the coffee king, and he controlled for a number of years the market of the United States. It is the only single article that the Senator from Vermont could have found, and I assert it emphatically, as to which he could have made the statement he made here to-day, that when the duty was taken off the price remained the same or increased to the consumer. The reason why the price remained the same (for I have examined this question) was simply owing to the fact that it was controlled by a Portuguese syndicate. The large proportion of our coffee product, more than six-tenths of the entire amount of coffee consumed in the United States, comes from Brazil; and a few rich Portuguese merchants at Rio Janeiro control that market. The product of the coffee plantations fixes the price together with the manipulations of this syndicate, and it is no fair test of the rule announced by the Senator from Vermont.

I will take the article of tea, which is not under the control of a syndicate, in which there is a great competition among the Chinese merchants and among the importers. When the duty was taken off tea it responded absolutely in the market and became that much cheaper to the consumer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state to him, with great respect, that I think he is wholly mistaken on the subject of tea.

Mr. VEST. We will settle that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the article to which the Senator refers, which was not written without a belief on my part that it was true, the price-lists of the chief commercial paper in the city of New York were taken six months before the duty was taken off and six months afterwards, and I submit with great respect, if my recollection is right, those prices did not show that they had responded substantially at all to putting tea on the free-list.

Mr. VEST. That is a question of fact, about which I have no idea but that the Senator from Vermont thinks he is correct, and I am very certain that I am. I have had occasion to examine this question very recently as well as more than a year ago, and I have the highest authority from the coffee merchants and importers in the city of New York and tables prepared from the most recent publications, and I assert here now, and I will prove it or else I will stand convicted of having made a misstatement that tea did respond almost exactly to the removal of the duty. But coffee did not; and I repeat that coffee is the only article in the commercial world that the Senator from Vermont could have made the basis of the article which he published in the Forum.

I do not want to go back into the arguments of the canvass, because they ought to be familiar to the entire American public; but the Senator from Vermont, with an enthusiasm which I had not expected, enters again into these arguments and asserts here to-day that the difference between labor in the United States and abroad is caused by the tariff. His position amounts to that or it amounts to nothing. He has drawn here an eloquent picture of the condition of the pauper labor of Europe and then of the sweet, comfortable domestic life of the American workingman.

Mr. President, that is as old as the hills that surround this Capitol. When Mr. Jefferson was minister to France he went incognito through the countries of Europe, and the Senator from Vermont is familiar with the picture he drew then of the condition of the peasantry of Europe, when he described a peasant with meat only once a week, living upon 3 cents a day, the women working in the fields, and all this thing which has been rehashed time and again in every canvass by Republican orators and high-protection statesmen.

But the question, and the salient point, is, did the tariff produce this condition of things, or did free trade produce it? Did the tariff produce the comfort in the home of the workingman in this country and did free trade produce pauperism in Europe? That is the salient point.

You come here to us with a bill increasing taxation; increasing tariff duties I will say, if you do not like the word "taxation." We demand of you the reason why we are to increase this protective duty. Your answer to us is, "In the name of American labor; to bring these comforts to the workingmen of the United States." Then you say, "Look at Europe. Look at the pauperism of Europe. Look at the women working in the fields," as was said in another branch of Congress, "absolutely without virtue, on account of the industrial system under which they live."

I happen to have by the merest accident before me a statement almost as eloquent and possibly more exact than that of the Senator from Vermont, from a very distinguished Republican and high-protectionist orator, Mr. Robert P. Porter, and I ask the Secretary to read the part marked, relating to Belgium.

The Secretary read as follows:

The men are paid every two weeks. Zinc rollers earn about 96 cents per day of ten hours, makers of "lozengers" for roofing tiles, from 78 cents to 96 cents per day. The laborers and miners earn the same as this class of labor in other industries, namely, from 50 to 62½ cents per day. As in the case of Seraing, many of the workmen reside 10 or 15 miles away from the works and come for the week, bringing their food with them. Saturday nights, both in Belgium and across the border in Prussia, you see hundreds of these workers streaming along the shaded roads towards their homes. Monday morning, long before sunrise, they return, loaded with their week's provisions, which consist of two large loaves, a piece of bacon or sausages, and eggs. Potatoes and onions they buy in the vicinity of the works. The Belgium workman lives principally upon rye bread, fat, and vegetables. Fresh meat to him is a luxury only to be thought of on special occasions. Sugar, milk, and cheese are also luxuries. They drink prodigious quantities of bad rye brandy, which is very cheap. He wears, generally, trousers of cotton check, a red flannel shirt, over which is a cloth shirt, and which joined to an ordinary vest forms a kind of sleeved waistcoat, which serves for a working costume. He wears overalls to go to the shop or factory in. Wooden shoes are almost universally worn, costing from 60 to 80 centimes a pair (12½ to 15 cents). They generally have a best suit for Sundays and feast days. Of underneath garments both male and female workers are almost absolutely destitute, and they rarely change frequently enough for decency.

Mr. VEST. This was in Belgium, but on another page of that pamphlet there is a description of the workingmen of Germany, which is even more appalling than that which has been read. Belgium is a free-trade country and Germany is the most highly protected country, except one, in Europe. Why is it, if the tariff produces this sort of destitution, that Germany does not have the comfortable homes that we have in the United States? Why is it that England with free trade is to-day threatened with the pauper labor of Belgium? What is the reason, if the tariff produces that state of things that taking free trade Belgium, as was depicted there by Mr. Porter, high-protected Germany has a worse condition even than Belgium? This pauperism comes neither from a high tariff nor free trade, but from density of population.

Mr. SPOONER. Germany has only had a protective tariff since 1879.

Mr. VEST. Is not that a pretty fair time in which to test the operation of that system?

Mr. FRYE. Wages have increased since then considerably in Germany.

Mr. VEST. The Senator says the wages have increased. Yes, and the wages have increased in England.

Mr. FRYE. I doubt it.

Mr. VEST. Ah! "Doubt!" There it is, of course. I assert to-day that in England wages have increased for a long time. It is true they have fluctuated, as they have in the United States, but there has been a steady increase from year to year, and wages are much higher there than they are to-day in Germany.

If the tariff produces this condition of comfort depicted by the Senator from Vermont, if it is the beneficent source of the increase of wages to the American laborer, why does not that law operate alike upon the different sections of this country? Why is it that, with a single river dividing two cities, labor is higher in one than in the other, and under the same national protective tariff system?

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he is not surprised that German statesmen, in view of the condition of things he has described, still insist upon a protective tariff? If the effect of it is to increase the misery of Germany, why is it that her statesmen should be so unwise? Has it ever occurred to the Senator what the condition would be in Germany provided they did not preserve their home market for their own productions?

Mr. VEST. When the Senator asks me why any protectionist does not think this or think that, I simply point him to the condition of affairs in this country to-day. What single protectionist is willing to take one cent off any protective duty? The cry is continually for more protection.

Mr. HISCOCK. So far as Germany is concerned, she has changed her policy and seems to regard it as necessary to preserve her own market for her own industries upon the theory that in preserving that market to some extent she benefits the labor of the country.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest question that the same sort of interests are at work in Germany to-day that are at work in the United States—greed, avarice, and the accumulation of large fortunes by the exercise of governmental powers for private purposes.

The Senator from Vermont says that we want to stimulate the importation of articles into this country. We want a fair living chance for all portions of this country under equal and just laws. We do not want the Government to enrich one set of people at the expense of another. We do not want burdens imposed on us in order to pile up colossal fortunes in one section of the country.

All this talk of protection to the farmer, as every intelligent man knows, is the merest humbug and cant and fraud. Out of more than $600,000,000 worth of articles exported from this country two-thirds come from agricultural products; and yet Senators talk to us about protection to an interest that sends out of this country two-thirds of more than $600,000,000 worth of exports. Every farmer in the country who is intelligent enough to manage his own business ought to know that there can be no protection to him by any legislation of Congress except it be to lessen expenses, to take off burdens.

That is the reason why we, who represent large agricultural communities, are here to-day protesting against this system which does not lessen the expenses of the farmer, but does increase his burdens. We sell in a free-trade market. We buy in the highest protected market in the world.

The Senator from Vermont talks about the price in Liverpool not fixing the price of agricultural commodities in the United States. It is true that truck gardens may not be influenced by it—potatoes and squashes and radishes—but take the great staples of this country; take cotton; take wheat; take corn. If wheat falls one-eighth or one-hundredth part of a cent in Liverpool to-day the price goes down just the same in Kansas City, where I live. The market of the United States on these great exports answers as certainly to the foreign market as the nerves answer to the brain, as one portion of the human system responds to another.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows what percentage of our corn goes abroad to that market which he says fixes the market price in this country?

Mr. VEST. I have the statistics here. I will turn to them. Here they are in Spofford's American Almanac.

Mr. TELLER. I want the Senator to state the quantity.

Mr. VEST. I am not able to state it without turning to the tables.

Mr. TELLER. What is the percentage of corn exported?

Mr. VEST. All I can say is that there is the information. The Senator can get it as soon as I can. He has as much time as I have.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that out of about 2,000,000,000 bushels of corn there never has been exported more than 4 per cent., and the market for corn in Europe has never affected the market for corn—I speak now of Indian corn—in this country.

If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him further, I should like to say to him that within thirty days wheat has been selling in the United States for several cents a bushel more than it has sold for in Liverpool, and that on more than one occasion the price in this country has been greater than the difference of transportation between the place where it was being sold and Liverpool, which is a positive denial, more telling than words can make it, of the statement the Senator is now making.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, this is a good place to put in the statement that outside of cotton the exportation of all the agricultural products of this country does not exceed 6 or 7 per cent. of the production of the country.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. On the point of the price of tea, raised just now by the Senator from Vermont, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in 1871 tea paid 10 per cent. tax or tariff. In 1872, in June, I think, the tax was removed. The importation of tea in 1871, when the tax was 10 per cent., was 17,254,617 pounds. In 1872, the year in which the tax was removed, the importations were 22,943,575 pounds; and in the next year, 1873, the first year in which we had free tea, there were 24,466,170 pounds of importations. If there was not some increase in price, there was a remarkable increase in the amount of importations.

Mr. VEST. Yes, more than that; the price of tea in the United States when the duty was taken off corresponded and answered exactly to that reduction.

As to what the Senator from Colorado says, that only such a per cent. of the corn production of this country goes abroad, I do not care what per cent. goes abroad; it makes no sort of difference in my argument. I say that the surplus which is sent out of this country and sold abroad fixes the price at home to the farmer, whether it is 1 per cent., or 4 per cent., or 6 per cent. It has been so as to wheat; and for the Senator to stand here to-day and announce that the Liverpool market does not control as to these great exports is simply to announce what the market reports every day contradict and what every intelligent man in this country knows not to be true. If to-morrow these products come down in Liverpool they immediately respond in the United States. The price is fixed to a fraction to the American farmer, and he must sell by the price in that market and nowhere else.

Senators talk about competition in the home market lessening the prices. I notice that none of these Republican orators here speak about the fall of price in commodities in Great Britain, a free-trade country, during the same time. It is all an ex parte statement. All through the late canvass we heard the announcement, "Look at the fall of prices. Take that coat, you granger, that you have on your back. What did you pay for it before the war? Why, you paid the other day about one-third of what you did then." Ah, but what would he have paid for it if he had bought it in a free-trade market in England? That is the question. But not one of them ever dared to turn to the English market and look to see, for he knew what he would see, that prices have gone down upon these same commodities in Great Britain, and therefore that the tariff has not done it. Whether you look at the prices on either the commodity or the labor the tariff has not done what is claimed for it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. To what does he attribute the fall of prices in Great Britain?

Mr. VEST. I attribute it to machinery. I attribute it to competition.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the Senator that I attribute it to the fact of the production in this country adding just so much to the supply in the markets of the world, creating, if you please, a larger supply for those markets and forcing down the price. I know of no speaker in our party who has ever ignored the question that prices were lower on the other side than they were here. On the contrary, every Republican speaker admitted that fact, and it was the argument upon which we addressed the people, that the increase of production in this country, gradually or rapidly, as you please, adding just so much as that product in the world's supply to meet the demand, has always regulated the price, and the diminution of the cost of transportation has had the effect to force down the price of everything. I believe that all of the late economical writers, both of the free-trade school and on the other side, for the last year or two have given to the American production the credit of the low prices of the world.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, we shall come to that question afterwards. I have a few observations and some statistics to produce in regard to it. All the Republican statesmen can not answer one single proposition, and that is, if the tariff has increased wages, if the tariff has decreased prices to the consumer, why is it that under a different system in Great Britain we find that the results have not come to pass which they predict would come to pass under free trade in the United States? Why is it that in Germany with a high protection the condition of the workingmen is even worse than it is in Belgium, where there is free trade, and in Belgium much worse than it is in free-trade England? For the very same reason that when you go to the Territories, to Montana, for instance, and have to hire a man to work for you under this same protective system, you pay him $40 or $50 a month, while I get the same work done in Missouri for $20 a month, simply because labor is scarce in Montana. As I said before, there are cities upon opposite sides of a river under the same law, in one of which labor will be 5 and 10 per cent. higher than in the other, and yet the tariff operates upon all alike, or it ought to do so. It certainly has the same legal force and effect in every portion of this country.

I happen to have before me an illustration of how this system of protection is working. Of course, nothing that comes from a Democrat can be accepted upon this question. We are the enemies of the country, trying to strike down American labor!

Mr. FRYE. That is so.

Mr. VEST. "That is so," says the Senator. Well, I have this much to say, that upon this question it is impossible for the Senator from Maine to think worse of me than I do of him. I think if he had a contract to bring this country to utter ruin he is carrying it out to the best of his ability. I believe honestly that he is robbing the people of this country upon whose labor and upon whose welfare depends the welfare of the entire Republic. I honestly believe it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Missouri just now thought nine years was plenty of time to test the German tariff. Does he not think twenty-eight years is a pretty good test of ours as to its effect on the country?

Mr. VEST. In twenty-eight years, with the natural resources of this country, the ingenuity of a million men like the Senator from Massachusetts could not hurt the country materially.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has concluded, then, that on the whole the tariff can not ruin the country?

Mr. VEST. This country has prospered not on account of this tariff system, but in spite of it, just as some men violate all the rules of health, all the demands of nature, and still live to an old age and enjoy comparatively good health. We have all heard about the phenomenal gentleman who drank a quart of whisky a day and went to bed drunk every night and lived to be a hundred years old. If he had left whisky alone and lived on water and tea you would have had to shoot him on the day of judgment. [Laughter.]

But to my pamphlet—not mine, it comes from another source—here is the argument of the New Haven Wire Company in behalf of a duty of four-tenths of a cent a pound on wire rods. I had laid this out for the next item in the bill. I want to call the attention of my Republican friends to one of their own number to show how this protective system operates. It is exactly like a great fish pond which the Senator from Vermont who addressed us wants to create in this country on the tariff question.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask what he means by "one of their own number" in connection with the statement he is about to read?

Mr. VEST. I mean one of the manufacturers. He is talking here for the great army of manufacturers.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator read the signature to that paper?

Mr. VEST. "New Haven Wire Company, by Samuel A. Galpin, receiver." It seems to be in the hands of a receiver. [Laughter.] I do not know Mr. Galpin, but I know this is a manufacturing company. The Senator from Rhode Island asks if he is one of them. If that does not make this concern one of them, I am unable to locate it.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it is in the hands of a receiver, it is one of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. VEST. If ever the Democratic party have received anything in this country except what they won at the polls, unaided by corporations and by money, I do not know it. All we receive is abuse and denunciation when we attempt in the interest of the consumers of the country to reduce taxation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I meant it in the sense of having gone through bankruptcy.

Mr. VEST. That may be, but it seems to me that for a gentleman who recently came out of the hands of a receiver that is crowing a little too soon. It seems to me I heard something of an election four years ago which did not result like the last one.

I will read what Mr. Galpin says. It illustrates what condition this country is coming to under the argument of the Senator from Vermont, that nothing is to be brought from abroad, that everything is to be produced at home, and it only needed for him to add to his remarks to-day that he wanted an ocean of fire between this country and the rest of the world in order to make his argument complete.

On behalf of the New Haven Wire Company, which is compelled to buy its raw material in the shape of wire rods—

They seem to disagree with my friend from Vermont, who says there is no raw material at all. He denies that in the universe there is raw material. Nothing like it exists, he says—either of American or foreign mills, and of about twenty other wire mills similarly situated, I respectfully ask that the duty on fence and rivet wire rods, of either iron or steel, when valued at 1½ cents per pound or less, be fixed at four-tenths cent per pound. The larger wire mills roll their own rods, but prefer to sell the product of their rod trains in the shape rather of finished wire than of rods; so that those wire mills which have no rod trains are forced to pay high prices for their American rods or use the foreign. In either case the price is determined by the cost of the foreign rods here, so that a reduction in duty would inure to the benefit of all these wire mills, whether they use foreign or domestic material. These mills employ more labor than all the rod trains in the country, and have a capacity to produce more than half of the wire which the country consumes. Under the tariff of 1883 their business has continually suffered at the hands of the mills rolling their own rods, and they now need protection, not against foreign competition, but against the high charges of the American rod mills.

In other words, the big fish are eating up the little ones; and here is one of the little ones that demands protection, not against competition on importations, but against American rod mills. So it is, one interest feeding upon another and all feeding upon the consumer.

The Democratic party to-day stands in this country, and intends to stand or fall by it, in favor of reducing taxes upon the consumers of the country, in favor of taking off the burdens imposed by this system; and we propose to fight every item in this bill from beginning to end if it takes until the 4th of March but what we will make plain to the American people that this whole legislation is in the interest of the people who are piling up colossal fortunes at the expense of our constituents.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to state that after two or three hours of debate the question I asked has not been answered. I called attention to the fact that this paragraph of the bill proposes a duty upon the ingot of $39.20 per ton. I follow it back and I find when you come to take off the duty imposed upon the iron pig it leaves a duty of $32.48 per ton. I go back to the testimony given by Mr. Oliver, of Pittsburgh, as to the cost of making the ingot from the iron pig. That is fixed at $3 per ton, which represents all the labor cost involved. I find, therefore, that here is an excess of duty of $29.48 per ton. I asked the reason this morning why that duty was imposed, and after three hours of debate I have yet failed to receive an answer.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I will take the opportunity to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to some other statements that he ought to make in discussing his own question.

He says it has been the pretense and is the pretense that the protective tariff is imposed for the benefit of the American laborer. I so understand him; and to illustrate his views of the enormity of its workings he supposes that an article of manufacture, woolens for instance, is placed under a duty of 50 per cent.; and then he shows the protection given to the workingman in this country who is engaged in the actual manufacture of that woolen article, if it be manufactured here, is about 10 per cent. He says that is all that is necessary in order to equalize the difference between the wages of the man who in our factory works upon that woolen article and the man who abroad in the foreign factory works upon the imported article, and that that 10 per cent. is sufficient to protect the American workingman in the manufacture of the woolen manufactured article.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is all they give him.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator says that is all they give him, and then he asks, what becomes of the other 40 per cent., and states by implication, and I think in direct words, at least he leaves the impression upon the mind, that the manufacturer has pocketed the rest. Thus he shows that the tariff is the instrumentality which enriches the mill-owner, which carries 40 per cent. of protection to the manufacturer, while it gives only 10 per cent. to the laborer, and he thinks that he has made out his case upon that illustration.

I wish to call the Senator's attention to a few suggestions and ask him if he is not entirely in the wrong, and if he does not either mislead himself or mislead others. I know he is an honest man, and if I am correct in my views perhaps he will acknowledge it, and if not I will ask him to show me wherein I am wrong.

The woolen article which is protected by a duty of 50 per cent. if manufactured in this country, corresponds to a woolen article manufactured in the old country. That woolen article manufactured in the old country is made up of the wool and of the labor that is in it. We agree so far, I presume.

The wool used in the old country is free-trade wool. It is wool produced by cheap labor. The manufactured article is made up of that free-trade wool and that pauper labor, and combining the two abroad you bring the article to this country and sell it in competition with the American article which is made up also of wool and of labor, and the labor entering into the manufactured article is upon his supposition protected 10 per cent.

But now as to the wool. The wool in the American article is American wool, and that is protected wool. It is a wool that is put into this article in competition with the free-trade wool in the old country. It is protected as well as the American labor, and we have in that wool, if it be wholly American wool, an additional interest or industry to protect which should be added to the 10 per cent. on the labor that has gone into the manufactured article in the factory itself. So the protection granted to the farmer or the wool-raiser should be added to this 10 per cent., and it may be 20, it may be 30, it may be 40 per cent. Adding the two together you will find that the protection to the wool and to the labor which is employed in the factory comes very nearly up to the whole 50 per cent. that is placed upon the manufactured article. Is not that true?

Mr. McPHERSON. Now, the Senator will bear with me a moment.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator answer me if I am right?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will answer the question, but I was going to show the Senator how entirely unnecessary his argument would be if he had examined the character of the Senate bill.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not talking about the character of the Senate bill, whether it be good, bad, or indifferent. I am talking about the Senator's illustration, which is so often put in this Chamber and elsewhere as the means of imposing upon the country with the idea that there is an exorbitant profit placed in the pocket of the manufacturer, and that he receives a substantial benefit while the laboring people get comparatively nothing at all.

Mr. McPHERSON rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BLAIR. I will yield to him to answer my question. I do not care to yield to the Senator for the general discussion of the bill, and I will give the Senator then the opportunity of making any explanation in his own time.

There is one other point to which I want to call attention. The Senator inquires when, protection having been given under the tariff in this country to American industries, has it been the case that the wages of the laboring people have been raised except as a result of strikes or combinations or efforts on the part of the working people themselves. Well, Mr. President, I have always said that the working people get just what they are able to take, and that combination, the right of combination, the power of combination, and the exercise of that power is their protection; and therefore it is that I have always been in favor of giving corporate rights, if you please, to the trades unions of the country. I believe in the right of striking, of combination, not of violence, but carrying the power of combination in favor of labor just exactly as far as it can be carried in favor of capital. It is the first great right of self-defense, and it must be thus exercised. If the capitalist needs protection against combined labor, as well does labor need protection against combined capital, and the two do combine; in the attrition of industry each gets all that it can and nothing more.

Here is a protective tariff which gives the work to do in this country and without which the work would not be performed here at all and consequently there would be nothing for which the laboring man could combine, there would be nothing which he could extort from capital in the way of increased wages. If we give this work to the Old World what rate of wages is there in controversy here in our own country? But the tariff keeps out the foreign articles and that gives us the work within our own geographical jurisdiction; and the work being here and to be done here, and the market here, and if there be any surplus to go abroad, the working people have some reason to combine and by combination they are able to take what belongs to them.

Both those points were raised by the Senator, and I should be glad to hear from him in regard to them.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator from New Hampshire had examined the Senate bill he would not have asked me for any information touching one of the issues he has raised with me. I will call his attention to page 145 of the Senate bill, paragraph 354, where it is provided that woolen cloths and woolen shawls shall pay 40 cents per pound and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem. Then in the next paragraph flannels, blankets, and hats of wool, 40 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem. Turn over now to the following page, paragraph 357, and you will find women's and children's dress goods put at 40 cents per pound, and in addition thereto 40 per cent. ad valorem; and so with ready-made clothing, 40 cents per pound and an additional rate of 45 per cent. ad valorem.

I said the duty was 50 cents a pound in this bill. I can find particular articles in the bill upon which the duty is over 60 cents per pound. That is irrespective entirely of the compensating duty on the cost of the wool. For instance, you take 4 pounds of unwashed wool supposed to make a pound of scoured wool ready for the carding-machine or the loom. Now, with a duty of 10 cents a pound on unwashed wool, the 4 pounds necessary to make the pound of scoured wool ready for the loom would be 40 cents. Therefore in this bill the first thing considered is the compensating duty, as I take it, upon the cost of the wool, for I can not imagine otherwise why the tariff should be 40 cents a pound. Before you begin to determine how much the cloth manufacturer should receive——

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator entirely misunderstands his own illustration, or else I do.

Mr. McPHERSON. I think you do.

Mr. BLAIR. What he is now speaking of has not the remotest connection with the illustration which he gave. He was saying to us that American labor——

Mr. McPHERSON. I am coming to that.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will pardon me if I say that what he is now stating has no relation whatever to the subject under debate between us.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator said that my statement of 50 per cent. ad valorem included the cost of the American wool and the high duty paid on the wool.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator is laboring under a mistake.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then I failed to understand it.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator made an illustration when he spoke of 50 per cent. protection to an American article when it was only necessary that labor should receive 10 per cent. protection to make up the difference between the foreign labor engaged in manufacturing a like article abroad and the American labor used in manufacturing the same article here, and he gave us to understand that the remaining 40 per cent.—the difference between the 10 and the 50 per cent.—was the actual profit which went to the manufacturer. That was the illustration and it has nothing to do with this matter he is now reading from the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I find from the census report of 1880, furnished by the Department of the Interior and the Census Office, that the entire labor cost in the manufacture of men's clothing was 21.9 per cent. of the entire cost of the product. I find that in women's clothing it was 20.8 per cent. That is the proportion of the labor cost to the entire cost of the product. Now, what is the cost of the product? The cost of the product is exactly the foreign cost plus the duty you impose upon it here.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will allow me to call his attention to just one point.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not just now. When I get through with my point I will yield.

Mr. BLAIR. It is in this connection that the Senator is getting wrong.

Mr. McPHERSON. The cost of that product to the purchaser in this market is exactly the foreign cost plus the duty, because there is the only place where you can find competition, and if the home manufacturer was able to fix his own price the cost of the article would be exactly what the domestic manufacturer asked for it. But as the foreign manufacturer can be a competitor the cost of the article is exactly what the foreign manufacturer—because he manufactures it cheaper—plus the tariff, can afford to sell it for to the American consumer.

Mr. CHACE. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey declines to yield, and he has the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. I stated that inasmuch as the tariff was raised, taking into consideration the professions of the Republican party and of Republican orators, both in this Chamber and elsewhere, I find that if labor in the United States is paid double what labor is paid abroad—and you claim that to be the reason for your tariff—then certainly the laborer abroad does not get over 10 per cent. of the entire cost of the product. He gets one-half of what the laborer gets here. Why, then, should you, acting professedly in the interest of American labor and for nothing else, have a tariff of 45 and 50 per cent. when labor only gets 10 per cent. out of it, because you do not claim that laborers in the United States get more than double what they get abroad, and when the entire labor cost of an article is only 20 per cent. of its merchantable value? I am exactly correct when I say that your tariff is four times the difference between the cost of labor here and the cost of labor abroad.

Mr. BLAIR. Now, I say to the Senator that he is just wrong in his statistics. There is no statement anywhere that the entire cost of labor in the manufactured article is 21 per cent.

Mr. McPHERSON. Here it is. I have it here.

Mr. BLAIR. Let me tell the Senator what he has there. He has there a statement that the cost of labor in the process of manufacturing the ready-made clothing, which begins with it as cloth, is 21 and a fraction per cent. That is what the Senator has got there. But the Senator knows that the labor which is in that clothing, tracing it clear back to the day when it began in the growth of the sheep upon which grew the wool, and which all the way through from the birth of the lamb down to the time the manufactured article is ready to be placed upon the person—all the way through it is labor, and it is not 21 per cent. of the entire cost of the manufactured article, but it is more than 96 per cent. of the entire cost of the manufactured article. There is nothing but labor from the beginning all the way down; and the Senator parades here statistics as to the cost of labor which have no reference to anything whatever except the labor that began with the tailor-shop, with the cutting up of the cloth, with the sewing, and the making of the goods after they were placed in the possession of the tailor himself.

Mr. McPHERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator knows very well that the cost of labor at 20 or 21 per cent. in ready-made clothing is not correctly stated. Take the illustration which we had here of the locomotive, or the manufacture of steel, which may have a protection of a single cent on a hundred pounds at the bottom of the mountain, and the same is true with reference to wool and with reference to ready-made clothing. It is all the same thing; and what I say to the Senator is that he misleads us, he misunderstands the subject evidently himself when he undertakes to say to us here that the difference between the protection of 10 per cent. as between the labor abroad and the labor in this country leaves all the balance of the large protection imposed in the hands of the manufacturer. It can not be so.

I will restate the position once more, if I may, by perhaps assuming and occupying the position of an instructor instead of a questioner. The foreign manufacture of clothing is to be compared with the domestic or American manufacture of clothing in the completed article, and American clothing is protected by a duty, as the Senator supposed, of 50 per cent. That is the duty upon the manufactured article. It is to be sold in our market in competition with a foreign article of just the same kind. That foreign article has gone through precisely the same processes as has the American article. First, it was raw wool, we will suppose, to say nothing about the plant, and in the plant the difference is largely against us. The interest upon the plant is at least twice here what it is there. But disregarding the plant entirely we have the wool and the labor abroad, we have the wool and labor at home. The wool and the labor abroad are both free-trade wool and labor. The wool and the labor at home are protected articles.

They are in competition with each other, just as much in competition when the two articles are brought together as the wool abroad is in direct competition with the wool in this country and the labor abroad in direct competition with the labor in this country.

We protect our wool and our labor in order to give protection to the American producer and the American workman, and it works all the way through to the farm, where everything begins, until you find the completed clothes worn by our people.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] was on the floor, I spoke from recollection in regard to the exports of corn. I find that the Agricultural Bureau reported in 1886 that the average for five years had been 3½ per cent. out of a total production of about 1,700,000,000 bushels. I think that statement is sufficient to show that the assertion that the price of corn here was affected by the small demand for it abroad is not correct.

I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri, whom I do not see in his seat, to a statement made by the Commissioner of Agriculture of that year with reference to the influence of exportations upon the agricultural crops. The statement is that only 7 per cent. of the agricultural products of this country were exported. That includes wheat and corn and cattle, and everything of an agricultural character.

Now, the Senator says that there is a very large production of agricultural exportation, independent of cotton. The agricultural products in 1876, independent of cotton, that were exported were about $277,000,000. The amount was less than $300,000,000 last year, independent of cotton, which everybody understands, no matter whether we buy or whether we do not buy of Great Britain and other countries, they are bound to have. We consume now more cotton than we did a few years ago. The Commissioner of Agriculture says:

> It is a short time since only one-fifth of the cotton and one-third of the tobacco were respectively the amount of domestic consumption. Now one-third of a much larger crop of cotton is required for home manufacture and fully half of the tobacco, and these proportions will be increased in the future, to the great benefit of growers and increased eagerness of foreign buyers.

We have exported a considerable quantity of wheat, but I believe it has never at any time exceeded about three-tenths of the product of the wheat crop of this country. Undoubtedly the demand in this country not being sufficient to use up the supply, the foreign market may to some extent control the price; but in corn and meats and things of that character, where the amount exported is so infinitesimally small, it does not in the slightest degree affect the prices in this country, as every practical business man knows.

Mr. President, we have never had in this country any very large surplus of corn; we have never had any remarkably large surplus of wheat. We raised last year forty-odd million less bushels of wheat than we had raised five years before; and the wheat crop has not kept pace with the increase of population.

So every year our wheat exportation is growing less, and so it will continue. It will grow less for two reasons: first, because we can not raise it profitably to compete with the people of other portions of the world. One of our consuls, in making a report within the last three or four months to the Government, stated that in Central Asia, within 150 miles of tide-water, wheat was being raised and sold for 10 cents a bushel. Everybody knows that if the ryot of India can get 15 cents a bushel for his wheat he is amply paid for the labor he bestows on it, according to the prices there; and when we realize that they can bring from Asia, through the Suez Canal, wheat for almost the same price that it can be brought from New York to Liverpool, you can see at once that the wheat crop of the United States can not hope for a European market, and, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests, less than they carry it for from Dakota to New York, infinitely less; and, as I have stated to the Senator from Missouri on more than one occasion, wheat has sold in Chicago within the last five years at prices so near the Liverpool prices that it was impossible to export it, and within the last thirty days wheat has sold in this country—not a phenomenal sale, either—at several cents higher than the Liverpool price. And yet we are told that the American farmer must depend and does depend upon a foreign market.

Why, Mr. President, every year of products made from the farm, independent of cotton (which is a crop that we need not consider, because, as I said before, Europe must have that crop), we do not export at any time over $300,000,000 worth a year and we never have of farm products, and we buy more every year of the things that ought to be manufactured upon American soil, that the men who manufacture would be the better if they were enabled to manufacture and do that much more. Why, Mr. President, of the coarser articles of merchandise, such things as can be manufactured in this country and are manufactured in this country, for ten years we have averaged more than $237,000,000 a year, every particle of which might have been manufactured here, because there are plants to manufacture everything that is included in that list in the United States. And yet the Senator from Texas, if I understood him, declared on this floor that we had plant capacity already for manufacturing twice what we could consume in this country. If already we have the plant, then it is a question simply of employing labor in the plant, and nobody is more interested than the laborer of this country.

I wish to enter a denial of the statement made here a few moments since by the Senator from New Jersey, that because every time he rose to address the Senate and made a statement somebody on this side of the Chamber did not contradict it, we were admitting it. Admitting it! Why, Mr. President, the platitudes that have come from that side of the Chamber are too old to be denied. They were worn out in the debating schools of this country thirty-odd years ago, and there has not been a new suggestion from that side of the Chamber on this question during this whole debate, not a single one; and is it expected that we are to reply to everything that may be said or else we are to be charged with admitting the truth of it?

This question I insist now, as I did before when I had the floor on this measure, is not a question specially concerning capital. It is a question that concerns the labor of the United States, the men who toil; and that is the class of men who were heard from last November in the State of New York, when her people came down to the city of New York with that great and magnificent majority which overcame the ignorance and the vice and the idleness of New York City. It was the intelligent residents of the rural districts; it was the farmers that were heard; it was the class of men that was heard in my State; and as I told the Senator from Louisiana, whom I see before me [Mr. GIBSON], before I went home prior to the adjournment, that State would give a bigger majority in proportion to its vote in favor of protection than Pennsylvania; and so it did—twice as great as Pennsylvania.

When Senators on that side of the Chamber tell us that they are going to educate the people, they do not understand the people. An analysis of the vote at the late election will show that it is the intelligent, reading, thinking people of the United States who sustain the American system in this country. It is the men who have attended public schools, who have had their education not only in books but in practical life. They are the men who sustain it. They do not inquire as to the theoretical rules that govern this question. They inquire what is the practical result. The man in New York who had seen a manufacture growing up by his side which had increased the price of his land, which had increased the price of his cattle and his grain knew that manufactures were good for him, whether they were theoretically wise or not; and that is the class of men who controlled the election and gave the electoral vote of the State of New York to the Republican candidates.

No, Mr. President, the Senators on the other side will have to educate the people of the United States by some other methods than those old, worn-out fallacies that the people have had dinned in their ears by the Cobden Club and by the free-trade speakers of this country for thirty or forty years. When the Democratic party shall be able to practically demonstrate that there is anywhere on the face of God's earth a country with greater opportunities for labor than this, then perhaps the laboring people in this country will take the same view of the condition of affairs as the Chief Executive seems to have done in his message.

Nobody denies here, nobody will deny here, that the laboring men of the United States are better paid than the laboring men of any other nation in the world. Nobody will deny that they have more comforts and that they have more luxuries and have more surplus at the end of the year to put in the bank than any other people on the face of the earth. Nobody will deny that high-priced labor is always accompanied by honorable labor, and nobody will deny that the laboring people of the United States are infinitely stronger and more influential, more potent in politics and in everything else than the laborers of any other portion of the world. Nobody will deny, either, that the laboring people of this country, their sons and their daughters, have opportunities of education, opportunities of advancement and preferment such as have never been given to the people of any other country at any other time in the history of the world.

Mr. President, to-day all the great industries of this country are controlled by the laboring people or by their sons. And not only the industries but all departments of life are filled with the laboring people. I do not care whether it is in science, or whether it is in industry, or whether it is in the halls of legislation, everywhere the laboring men have made themselves felt. Why? Because, in the first place, they have had the opportunity given them by remunerative wages. Cheap wages means cheap men. Cheap wages means a lack of opportunity to advance. Good wages means the opposite. Therefore, I repeat, the Senator from New Jersey need not expect every time he gets up and asserts that labor is not interested in this, that somebody is to reply or else we are to stand convicted of having abandoned the interests of the laboring people of this country.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, my own preference would be that this bill should be voted upon as expeditiously as possible. It seems to me that the elections which have recently occurred, whether the question of the tariff was the controlling question or not, have settled definitively the policy which will be pursued by the prevailing party for the next four years. Therefore I am of the opinion that, after an examination of the different items of this bill, it should be forwarded to its passage expeditiously, and it is not my intention either now or at any subsequent period of the consideration of this bill to interpose anything which may promote delay in its expedition through the Senate.

It seems to me, however, that we have had propositions advanced in the discussion here by those who aid in the formation of public opinion and in the policy of the other side which will destroy any system of reasonable protection to the industries of this country, which will prevent that kind of protection which is incidental and moderate and made upon the basis of the adjustment of a revenue tariff. I listened the other day with some little surprise to the following remark made by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]:

I grant—

He says in the RECORD of Friday last—

that the $18—

Speaking of pig-iron—

is paid for it, but I say in reply to that, as I did to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that these duties are not piled one upon the other, but the last duty upon the more highly finished product is intended only to compensate for the increased labor-cost in advancing the article to that last stage.

That is a proposition upon which there ought to be no kind of doubt. The cost of the element of labor in any production is a fact easily ascertained. That ought to be ascertained and put before the country in the fair discussion of this question.

But the proposition that this bill or any protective system does not pile duties one upon the other is in itself manifestly wrong. What do you protect against? It is the finished product which bears the entire cost of its own production, and the object of the protection is to protect the finished product here against the finished product elsewhere; therefore it matters not by whom the different processes of this production may be conducted, it is the whole that must bear the cost of production. Otherwise you would discriminate against the producer of the finished product by imposing the duty upon the unfinished parts of the product. So that in any system of this kind there must be duties piled one upon the other, and the finished product must bear the whole cost of production. It amazes me that there should be discussion or question upon this subject. It is the necessary incident of a protective tariff, a tariff based upon the idea of imposing upon the consumer the entire cost of the encouragement or the inducement or the stimulus to the producer.

Another proposition which has been made here to-day seems strange to me in a body of this character, and that is that the production of an article must pay the cost to the consumer, the cost of its consumption. That is a remarkable proposition. You impose a duty upon some article imported into this country and you deny the ordinary and natural effect that the cost of the article produced and taxed must be paid for by the consumer, and that the entire cost of the production must rest upon him who consumes. That is a natural law. In defending a bill which proposes as a revenue measure to impose duties, taxes on imports, as you may please to term it, it seems strange that it should be thought necessary to deny this essential and necessary principle that the cost of production of an article can not include the cost of its consumption, but that these are two distinct elements, the consumer consuming and paying from his own resources, the production and the cost of production, whether this cost be made up of duties or otherwise, another and an entirely different series of causes and effects. If the producer or production pays the tax or the cost to the buyer or consumer, how, then, are you reasonably to defend a system of protection to the producer? The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said here to-day that the taking off the cost, the import duty upon an article, which is simply one of the elements of its cost, did not reduce it to the consumer, and he instanced the case of coffee from Brazil. But that was not, I think, an ingenuous argument. Unquestionably for that and to that extent the taking off the cost, the duty, as any other element of cost, was a reduction of the cost to the consumer, but not a necessary or an inevitable reduction of the price of the article. The producer of the article might have it in his power to increase the price over and above the duty subtracted. A scanty crop, a combination, a difference in market price elsewhere, might all make up the deficiency or increase the price far beyond what it was, but that Senators here in this body should undertake to maintain the proposition that the natural and necessary effect of taking off any element of cost from the production of an article did not diminish the proper and natural cost to the consumer I think was remarkable in a discussion of this kind before a body of this character.

These are elementary propositions, and therefore should be considered in that light and not obscured in the manner in which they have been. Why, Mr. President, upon the theory that is maintained here, is admitted to be true, that everything ought to be produced in this country, what, then, is the natural and necessary conclusion? Is this result to be best effected by a tariff that shall increase the price of articles produced here to the consumer? Is not the necessary conclusion that there should be a prohibition of all imports into this country? If it be true that the interest of this people, the rate of wages, the general comfort and contentment of the people is increased by the production at home of every article of consumption—admit that proposition to be true, then does it not follow, as the night follows the day, that there should be a prohibition of any imports into this country? What connection has that with the revenue system? Why should the consumer here be made to pay by permitting any imports to come here under a high rate of duty for the restriction or the limitation of the amount imported? Why not accept the proposition and say, "We are a boundless continent of diversified capacities; we can produce everything; it is better that we should, and therefore we prohibit the importation into this country of anything?" But we have a different system. We have a system of duties on imports under the authority conferred to regulate commerce and to impose duties for revenue, imposts, and taxes.

Now, we are abandoning that. Under the pretense of a revenue bill we are arguing here for a system of absolute prohibition. The arguments and the proposition upon which this bill is maintained upon the other side demand an embargo upon commerce, and not a bill for revenue taxation with rates of duties adjusted to that purpose.

It seems to me that it is unwise to thus divert the strength of the argument on which a tariff must rest, a reasonable and a moderate tariff, not imposing great burdens upon the consumer, but adjusted so as to bear lightly upon him, and to that extent furnishing incidentally the encouragement that might be rendered to industries of different kinds. Suppose we accept the proposition of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and others; suppose that we say that the farmer when he sees a factory built in his neighborhood understands that it will increase the price of his land, the value of his garden products, the value of his farm products.

We may admit that proposition, but then, what is the next proposition? Encourage it; but how encourage it? Encourage it by imposing burdens upon the general consumption of the country, including himself? Is there no other way to build that factory there but to increase the number of starving mouths in the country? Will it not be better to ascertain precisely what is needed to encourage and build that factory and appropriate that amount of money to it? What necessary connection with the proposition of the building of that factory has the imposition of a general tax upon the entire consumption of the country? Does not the necessary supply of the wants of the community furnish some inducements to enterprise and inventions and ingenuity, and if the general public must aid in this by a public policy, does not the argument demand that it shall be done with the least possible cost to the people and by a well-considered system not in any wise connected with the question of collecting revenue.

Mr. President, no man will avow that, but you can not extend this system of reasonable and limited and easy protection under a revenue tariff, to the extent of making it prohibitory or highly burdensome to the country, without reaching this conclusion. Admit, if you please, the necessity for this diversified industry for different productions, still you must look to the means by which that shall be accomplished. It is not reasonable to insist that diversity of production is necessary to a State, that a home market is desirable, and therefore the people shall be taxed oppressively—the cost of articles consumed by them shall be increased to the extent necessary to make the business profitable to those who carry it on, and not fix the amount of that profit nor designate the proportion that each person engaged in the production shall have.

Then, again, we have had a question here whether or not the point of chief distribution of commercial products controls the price. It has been gravely asserted here that the price of wheat does not depend upon the foreign market, that the price of corn does not depend upon the foreign market. Well, the term "foreign" has no place in the consideration of these questions. The point of chief distribution by a law of nature, which all the world can not change, will determine the price of any product in any market or place accessible to it, that is, within the area of its distribution, and it will determine it by the difference in the cost of transportation between the point of general distribution, or chief distribution, and the place of production, whether it be controlled by the money centers of the world or whether it be controlled by the actual distribution of the commodity, and generally they are both combined, but it is an economical fact, known for hundreds of years, that the point of chief distribution, whether at home or abroad, of any product determines and fixes its price.

It is true that under our system of commercial exchange, under our system in Wall street, under our speculative methods of anticipating the supply, and under the general exchange which exists in England with all the world, and her control of all money centers, wherever there is any exportation to that common center of the world's exchanges, however small it is, it affects and fixes with almost absolute certainty the price of the production, whatever it may be, in all other portions of the country, for the reason that it can not be ascertained definitely how much of that product the price of which is fixed in the general center of the world's distribution, may not be disposed of there; and as long as that fact remains in every point of local supply to the owner of the thing to be exported, it remains an open question to him that there may be a market there for the article whose price is thus determined at this general center of exchange, and conversely it is true to the consumer or buyer that the supply is open to him in all places in connection with that center of exchange.

So it seems to me, Mr. President, that the propositions upon which this bill and these high rates of duty are defended here are entirely foreign to any practical system of protection or to the wants and needs of the country. It would be wise to reduce this whole scale of duties and to let this bill go before the country as a revenue bill with a reasonable amount of protection adjusted between these different industries. We have joined issue upon that proposition. It has been discussed here for weeks, the country has acted upon it, and therefore I, for one, am in favor of having this bill passed as rapidly as it can be done with fair consideration to its different provisions.

It is my purpose to move some amendments to the bill in regard to matters that peculiarly concern my own region of country, proposing in some places an increase of the duty and in some places a restoration of the duty to the rates in the existing law.

Mr. President, I do not propose to enter further into the merits of this discussion, but it is entirely manifest that whenever you impose a high rate of duty upon the imports into a country, whenever that system is resorted to, you effectually build up a plutocratic aristocracy, and you had better amend your Constitution and give the title to those who own their hundreds of millions of dollars and make it hereditary in them than to base their prosperity on excessive taxation of the people.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said to-day that there was no grant from Congress to any individual establishing a monopoly. Why, does not that learned and able Senator, so long a leader of public opinion in this country, know that there are laws more powerful than any laws which Congress may pass, which accumulate in the hands of individuals the control of great interests of every kind? Do we not know that the great railroad interests of this country are now in the control of a combination more powerful than the aristocracy of England or of any other country, and that they have almost absolute power to impose their own charges upon the labor and the production of this country?

It is true we ought to regulate that, but how little have we progressed in that direction? How great and numerous are the accumulations of individual fortunes? I, for one, can see that there is some good to result from these great accumulations. I am not amongst those who decry them, but while we may be endeavoring, under a proper system of tariff duties, to foster industries within the limits of a reasonable imposition upon the people, is it not wise to look at the other side of the question and see whether we are not building up a vast aristocracy of unlimited wealth and power, with power to control your legislatures, power to control your elections, to buy your judiciary, to control your Presidency, and thus to create antagonisms between them and the people, fatal alike to the Republic and to them?

That, Mr. President, is to me the unfortunate side of this question. I am not averse to a tariff based upon just principles as a method of collecting revenue, discriminating even to the furthest extent to which it may discriminate, without imposing oppressive burdens upon the country, but who shall say that we can adopt in this age of the world a system of commercial prohibition, of non-intercourse. Mr. President, there can be no doubt of the fact that exchange with all nations of the world, subject only to reasonable restriction for purposes of revenue, for the purpose of preventing, perhaps, the country from being flooded at particular periods with goods, monopolies, or productions of other countries under circumstances peculiar to themselves—there can be no question that with these reasonable and limited restrictions that exchange, commercial intercourse, is the basis of civilization and of all values.

If you say you have trade between the States of the United States and the people of the United States, do you not admit the principle that trade throughout the world is necessary for all public and private interests? What is the magic of trade between the boundary limits that constitute this country? Is there something in that which makes that trade of peculiar economic efficacy? You can prohibit the importation into this country of any product from abroad when you see that it is becoming injurious.

The natural, efficacious, and proper way is to pass a law to that effect. But upon the general proposition that commerce is desirable, subject to such restrictions as may be reasonable, there can be no doubt. Whether with Africa or with Asia, whether with the ryot of India, or whether with the richest country of the world, England, commerce everywhere is desirable. What is it? It is the exchange of something you have here for something that you can get elsewhere at an advantage in the transaction to yourself. It is the giving of an hour of your labor for two hours of another man's or another country's, and when you find, as may be, that that exchange is becoming disadvantageous to your country, why not prohibit it?

Why impose upon the consumer, the poor man, the laborer of this country, additional cost of the necessaries of life? Admit he is better off than anywhere else; admit he is happier here than anywhere; but give some credit to our free institutions, some credit to the vast fertility of our soil, some credit to its boundless diversity of wealth; give credit to the natural ingenuity of your people, who would do something even without the bounty of Government. Take all these things into consideration and say, "Very well, we will stimulate this industry, this enterprise, this capacity for development amongst our people."

We will stimulate it how? Not by imposing additional burdens upon these poor people. The vast majority of them are necessarily, notwithstanding the picture presented by the Senator from Vermont, poor and needy and in want. The great majority of our people have not the luxuries they ought to have; in our advancing civilization the extent of the area of comfort of every human being day by day under the inventions of the age should make every family more and more contented and better and better provided.

What then are the arguments which say, "Contrast us with the rest of the world. Are we not better?" Admit it. Have we not a right to be better and better still? Are we to get better by imposing a higher price upon the necessaries of life? Is there any point of view in which a high rate of duties to be paid by the consumer can be justified? Admitting all the assumptions and arguments and propositions of the other side, in my opinion, Mr. President, there is not.

In my judgment the most fatal thing for the capitalists and manufacturers of this country is a high rate of import duty. It is far better for their accumulations, in my judgment, that we should not impose upon the people of this country, the consumers, a burden greater than they can easily bear. That far I am willing at this time to go, and I am persuaded that all the best interests of business and of those who possess great fortunes and of the people demand that this limitation be carefully observed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], but I will transfer the pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], who is not paired, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], whom I do not see in the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. SAWYER'S name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] has been called away from the Senate Chamber, and told me that he was paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], or else I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. With the consent of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], I have transferred my pair with his colleague [Mr. GIBSON] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], and therefore I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bate,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	McPherson,	Vance,
Call,	Gray,	Reagan,	Walthall.
Cockrell,	Harris,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—20.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Platt,

Cameron,	Gorman,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Chace,	Hale,	Quay,
Chandler,	Hampton,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Riddleberger,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Call,	Davis,	Faulkner,
Allison,	Chace,	Dawes,	Frye,
Bate,	Cockrell,	Dolph,	Gray,
Berry,	Coke,	Edmunds,	Hale,
Blackburn,	Cullom,	Eustis,	Hawley,
Hiscock,	Mitchell,	Saulsbury,	Vance,
Hoar,	Morrill,	Spooner,	Vest,
Ingalls,	Pasco,	Stewart,	Walthall,
Jones of Arkansas,	Platt,	Stockbridge,	Wilson of Md.
McPherson,	Ransom,	Teller,
Manderson,	Reagan,	Turpie,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. It is very evident that the majority on the other side of the Chamber will defeat the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, the call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn.

The amendment was rejected.

ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. MANDERSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
R. W. TOWNSHEND,
LEVI MAISH,
JNO. H. GEAR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator state the effect of that?

Mr. MANDERSON. It changes the rank from brigadier-general, as in the House bill, to colonel of cavalry, as in the Senate amendment, making the rank the same that General Smith held in the regular service.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand that it is proposed to take the vote now on the report of the conference committee?

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that it be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such reports are always in order.

Mr. CALL. I prefer that it should lie over. Have the committee of conference agreed?

Mr. MANDERSON. The committee of conference have agreed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No action is required by the Senate, the report being that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. PALMER. I ask permission to make a request.

In September the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture passed the Senate. A committee of conference was asked of the House of Representatives, and Messrs. SABIN and GEORGE were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate with myself. The House has agreed to the conference and appointed its conferees, but Messrs. SABIN and GEORGE are now away from the city. I ask that they be excused from service upon the conference committee, and that two substitutes be supplied by appointment of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection; and the Chair announces as managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, in the place of the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Mississippi, excused, Messrs. BLAIR and BATE.

RIGHT OF WAY ACROSS PAPAGO INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. DAWES. I present a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received.

Mr. DAWES. There is no action called for, the House having receded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7843) granting to Citrous Water Company right of way across Papago Indian reservation in Maricopa County, Arizona, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

H. L. DAWES,
F. B. STOCKBRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. W. PEEL,
THOS. R. HUDD,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report requires no action by the Senate.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. 3445) to declare unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade and production be reprinted.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, a statement concerning leases for lands, mineral or otherwise, in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 5752) for the relief of Julia Triggs;
A bill (H. R. 9163) granting a pension to Eli Garrett;
A bill (H. R. 9654) granting an increase of pension to Jesse J. Clark;
A bill (H. R. 11223) to increase the pension of George A. Glover; and
A bill (H. R. 11378) granting a pension to James S. Harden.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION.

The bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Association was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. That bill is in substance a bill which has already passed the Senate. The American Historical Association is a very important body, a meeting of which is to be held in this city in the course of two or three weeks, and I should like the leave of the Senator who has the tariff bill in charge to allow it to pass at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length for information.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has that bill been reported from a committee of the Senate?

Mr. HOAR. That bill is in substance the same as a bill reported from the Library Committee which has passed the Senate. The House bill has come here, the only difference being that the House thought fit to limit the place of allowing ownership of the real estate to the District of Columbia, while the Senate bill allows them to hold it anywhere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that the first meeting is to be held in the District of Columbia, and after that wherever the stockholders choose to meet, which raises to my mind a pretty serious question as to how far the power of Congress may go into the States to create corporations all over the country; and I should wish, unless there is some very immediate and urgent reason to the contrary, that the bill should go to a committee.

Mr. HOAR. There is an immediate and urgent reason which I stated, and that is that the American Historical Association is one of the most important learned bodies in the country, composed, as the Senator will see from the names of the corporators, of very distinguished scholars. I know a good deal about the gentlemen composing it. Their plan is to have their meetings in different parts of the country, just as the American Association for the Advancement of Science have, but their headquarters and their collections are to be deposited in the District of Columbia, and their first meeting is to be held here.

The fact that they will hold meetings about the country to interest the people in the different cities in their work does not give it any the less a national character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better see the bill in print, not that I have the slightest objection to this particular thing, because it is a most useful and I dare say valuable arrangement, but it would make a very strong precedent for incorporating business corporations with power to do business all over the country, and I think the bill ought to be printed so as to give us a chance to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be referred to a committee or lie on the table?

Mr. HOAR. My honorable friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has himself recently promoted the formation of a corporation whose whole business is to be done at Nicaragua, outside of the United States, and it strikes me that this objection is a little hypercritical, but I have no objection to the reference if he desires it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I may say in reply to my honorable friend from Massachusetts that I have promoted to the best of my ability a corporation to be incorporated by Congress to carry on business in Nicaragua, which I think is an entirely different thing from Congress incorporating a body of people to carry on business anywhere in the United States, for I believe it concerns our foreign relations, and, in a very broad sense, the public welfare. That is within the Constitution; and I do not think there is any comparison in respect of the power of Congress to create a corporation to colonize Africa, if you please, or to build a canal through Nicaragua or Panama, and a corporation to do business in the State of Kansas, or of Massachusetts, or of Vermont. So I must say, with great respect to my honorable friend, that I think his implied criticism of my inconsistency is entirely unfounded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be referred to a committee or lie on the table?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that it be referred to the proper committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on the Library, if there be no objection, and printed.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that that be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIZA J. ALEXANDER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander, which was, in line 4, to strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty."

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SAWYER, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. TURPIE.

MARY E. JOHNSTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston, which was, in line 6, to strike out the name "E. Johnson" and insert "E. Johnston;" and at the end of the bill to add:

And pay to her legally constituted guardian a pension of $18 per month.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. House bill 9051 is before the Senate. The reading will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The reason is that it is necessary that I shall be absent from the Senate Chamber to-morrow, and on paragraph 150 I wish to reserve any rights to offer amendments at some future time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That right has been reserved with regard to all sections and paragraphs of the bill. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest that probably there are some nominations that ought to be referred, and we should have a short executive session. If the Senator from Arkansas will withdraw his motion I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas withdraw his motion?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 18, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 17th day of December, 1888.

Carl F. Stoelzel, to be postmaster at Loudonville, in the county of Ashland and State of Ohio, in the place of John G. Herzog, resigned.

Frederika H. Bryan, to be postmaster at Newtown, in the county of Bucks and State of Pennsylvania, in the place of John S. Bryan, deceased.

John L. Stedman, to be postmaster at Mauch Chunk, in the county of Carbon and State of Pennsylvania, in the place of Nathan D. Cortright, jr., whose commission expires December 22, 1888.

C. J. Bartlett, to be postmaster at Marlin, in the county of Falls and State of Texas, in the place of Thomas C. Oltorf, resigned.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY.

Leon O. Bailey, of Indiana, to be attorney of the United States for the district of Indiana, vice Emory B. Sellers, resigned.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Lyman S. Strickland, of Maine, to be collector of customs for the district of Aroostook, in the State of Maine, to succeed John P. Donworth, whose resignation has been accepted.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 17, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

The following additional member appeared and took his seat:

Mr. JOHN J. O'NEILL.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HUNTER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. RICE, from Monday until Friday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. BACON, indefinitely, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CUMMINGS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving certified copies thereof, the papers in the case of F. M. H. Kendrick.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Association, and to put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. This bill is erroneously on the House Calendar, being a private bill. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Andrew D. White, of Ithaca, in the State of New York; George Bancroft, of Washington, in the District of Columbia; Justin Winsor, of Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts; William F. Poole, of Chicago, in the State of Illinois; Herbert B. Adams, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland; Clarence W. Bowen, of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, their associates and successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic, by the name of the American Historical Association, for the promotion of historical studies, the collection and preservation of historical manuscripts, and for kindred purposes in the interest of American history and of history in America. Said association is authorized to hold real and personal estate to an amount not exceeding $500,000, to adopt a constitution, and to make by-laws. Said association shall have its headquarters at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and shall hold its annual meetings in such places as the said incorporators shall determine. Said association shall report annually to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution concerning its proceedings and the condition of historical study in America. Said Secretary shall communicate to Congress the whole of such reports, or such portion thereof as he shall see fit. The Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are authorized to permit said association to deposit its collections, manuscripts, books, pamphlets, and other material for history in the Smithsonian Institution or in the National Museum, at their discretion, upon such conditions and under such rules as they shall prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will not object if it is understood that the consideration of the bill shall be concluded within ten minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. I am willing to agree to that.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. PHELAN. I offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "real and personal estate," in lines 14 and 15, insert the words "in the District of Columbia." Also, in line 17, strike out the word "headquarters" and insert the words "principal office."

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether it carries an appropriation?

Mr. PHELAN. None.

Mr. KILGORE. And they do not propose to come before the next Congress and ask an appropriation?

Mr. PHELAN. No, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. Then I have no objection to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT KANSAS CITY.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up for consideration at this time the bill (S. 281) making an appropriation for the extension and enlargement of the United States custom-house at Kansas City, Mo. I understand that the gentleman who objected to it last Friday will not urge the objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, that I may report a privileged resolution concerning the proposed recess for the holidays?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back the resolution which I send to the desk.

The report was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 14, 1888.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution fixing the time for the recess, having considered the same, report it back with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out the words "Monday, January 7" and inserting "Friday, January 4," and as amended that it pass.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, having introduced the original resolution which was referred to the committee, I desire to say a word.

Mr. McMILLIN. I retain the floor, but yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HOOKER. I was about to remark, Mr. Speaker, that, having introduced the resolution for the recess, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire to say a word in reference to the character of the amendment which has been reported by the committee, and only a word. In drawing the resolution I named as the time for the reassembling of Congress Monday, the 7th day of January next, but the committee have reported the resolution back with an amendment providing for the reconvening of Congress on Friday, January 4, instead of Monday, the 7th. Now, the probabilities are that a great many members of the House will not be able to get back here before Monday, the 7th of January, so that even if we do reconvene on the 4th there will probably be very little business of a legislative character done before the succeeding Monday. The resolution as originally presented and referred to the committee gave the three additional days, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, for members to travel back from their homes to the capital, and I think that very little will be accomplished in the way of economy of time by adopting the amendment recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means.

A MEMBER. When does this proposed recess begin?

Mr. HOOKER. At the termination of the session of Friday, the 21st, so that we shall have the entire day of Friday for business on the Private Calendar, as the adjournment will not take place until Friday evening. Members will then have Saturday and Sunday to travel to their homes. The resolution as originally drawn proposes the 7th of January as the day for the reassembling of Congress, while the amendment proposes the 4th. If we fix the 7th we shall have those three additional days, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, for members to reach the capital. I hope that the amendment offered by the Committee on Ways and Means will not be adopted, but that the resolution will be agreed to in its original shape. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the amendment will be agreed to. The shorter the recess the better, in view of the great amount of business before us.

The question being taken on the amendment of the Committee on Ways and Means to strike out "Monday, the 7th," and insert "Friday, the 4th," there were—ayes 52, noes 64.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 24, noes 92—more than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 98, nays 108, not voting 117; as follows:

So the amendment reported by the Committee on Ways and Means was rejected.

At the conclusion of the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I reached the Hall just as the Clerk had passed my name on the second roll-call. If present, I would have voted "ay."

Mr. HERBERT. I ask to have my vote recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir; I came in just afterward.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request under the rules.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move to dispense with the recapitulation of the names.

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

The Clerk having recapitulated the names,

The SPEAKER. The pairs will now be announced.

The following members were announced as paired on political questions until further notice:

Mr. SCOTT with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. RICE with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. BACON with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES with Mr. PATTON.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. FULLER.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, with Mr. OWEN.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. WHITE, of Indiana.

Mr. DOUGHERTY with Mr. HUNTER.

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. MCCOMAS.

Mr. SENEY and Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, were announced as paired for ten days.

Mr. WILKINSON with Mr. FUNSTON, for one week.

The following members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. BUTTERWORTH.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. KELLEY.

The following members were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. GRIMES with Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky.

Mr. ENLOE with Mr. BELDEN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions.

EXPENDITURES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the further sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be available and payable out of the contingent fund of the House to pay the expenses of the Select Committee to Inquire into the Immigration of Contract Laborers, Convicts, and Paupers, to be paid upon the order of the chairman and one member of said committee, in sums not exceeding $1,000 at any one time; and all vouchers for said expenditures shall be certified to by the chairman and by a member of said committee: Provided, That said sum shall not be available until the amount now in the hands of said committee shall be expended.

The committee having considered the foregoing resolution, report it back with the recommendation that the word "five" in the first line be stricken out and the word "two" be inserted, so that it shall read "$2,000" instead of "$5,000;" and as so amended that it be adopted.

Mr. SOWDEN. On the adoption of the resolution I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen in support of and fifteen in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM. I wanted to ask the committee, or some member of it, how much money has been appropriated up to the present time?

Mr. FORD. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. DUNHAM. And you want $5,000 more?

Mr. FORD. Two thousand.

Mr. SOWDEN. Five thousand dollars was the amount originally appropriated, and this request came to our committee asking five thousand more, but the committee reported back recommending two thousand.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is this a sort of "junketing" affair?

Mr. GUENTHER. Does the gentleman say that it is?

Mr. DUNHAM. I am asking for information. I do not pretend to say what it is.

Mr. GUENTHER. On behalf of the committee, permit me to say that it is nothing of the kind.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out "five" and insert "two."

The amendment was adopted, there being, on a division—ayes 28, noes 2.

Mr. DUNHAM. Is this resolution before the House for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The amendment has been adopted, but under the rules of the House thirty minutes are allowed for debate after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. DUNHAM. This committee have expended, or are supposed to have expended, up to this time, as I understand it, $5,000.

Mr. BREWER. About nine thousand.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am informed that they have expended $9,000.

Mr. FORD. No; that is incorrect.

Mr. DUNHAM. You have received already $5,000, and then $2,000——

Mr. GUENTHER. No; you are mistaken.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, let me be corrected.

Mr. GUENTHER. Do you want to be corrected?

Mr. DUNHAM. I want to know the facts.

Mr. GUENTHER. This $2,000, if now appropriated, will make the total amount $7,000.

Mr. DUNHAM. How many members are there on the committee?

Mr. GUENTHER. Five.

Mr. DUNHAM. That makes a little over $1,000 a head for each member.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The members of the committee do not get it.

Mr. GUENTHER. You have no idea, I presume, that the members of the committee divide this money amongst them?

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not understand that the members of the committee get it, but I have no idea where $5,000 has been expended in this business, and I would like to have some information.

Now, it seems to me, as I started out to say, that this is a sort of a junketing affair. I do not know but that some good and valuable information may be obtained as the result of their labors in time. But certainly we have no idea of what has been done up to date, excepting that they have spent a good deal of money. I have no desire to move to lay this on the table without hearing from somebody on the other side, to see what reason can be given in support of it. If any gentleman will furnish satisfactory information, I will yield the floor for that purpose, reserving the remainder of my time. Otherwise I propose to move to lay it on the table.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, when this committee was organized it was directed by the House to investigate a question upon which there was absolutely no literature whatever, and no available facts except what might be gleaned from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to the number of immigrants landing on our shores. We were directed to investigate the alleged violations of the laws of the United States, and I think that no man who is familiar with the labors of that committee could accuse it of any laches, or of any extravagant expenditures. We were in constant session about eight weeks. We conducted an investigation by means of the special agents of the Treasury Department after the adjournment of the committee, and we have sworn a large number of witnesses who were examined. It was a question to investigate which necessitated us to call and examine many unwilling witnesses; and I think when the testimony is submitted—a large part of it is now in the hands of the Government Printer—and when it is perused by the gentleman he will not accuse the committee of having wasted any public money, or of having been otherwise than diligent in its labors.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. FORD. Certainly.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will you please state how this money has been expended up to this time?

Mr. FORD. It was expended for witness fees, in the employment of detectives, in the expenses of the committee, and in various ways. We have determined not to visit the Pacific coast, and it is not the desire of the committee to squander the moneys appropriated.

Mr. DUNHAM. You would want ten thousand more if you did that.

Mr. FORD. I want to remark that we did not deem it necessary, in view of the passage of the Chinese exclusion act, to investigate that subject; but what we do desire within the next few weeks is to complete our investigation, make a report after the recess, and prepare a bill upon what seems to me to be one of the most important subjects that has ever been investigated or looked into by any Congress.

Mr. GUENTHER. If my friend from Illinois thinks that this is a junketing committee, and has any desire to become a member, I will say that I shall gladly resign in his favor and give him all the chance of junketing that there is in it. So far as I have seen there has been only labor, a great deal of labor, and nothing of what he is pleased to call "junketing."

Mr. DUNHAM. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is any use to prosecute the investigations by this committee any further. We have received some light as to what they have done by reports in the papers; and it seems to me that any further investigation by this House is, therefore, unnecessary.

This committee does not trust the United States, or the officers of the Government who are intrusted with the enforcement of the United States laws, to enforce the laws that are now and have been on the statute-book for the last four years, to prohibit the importation of contract labor into this country. I think if we wait a couple of months, by that time we will have an administration in harmony with the laws on the statute-book——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, and others. Oh! Oh!

Mr. KERR. And if any immigrants are brought in in violation of that law, the officers then appointed will see that the law is enforced. It would not be necessary to have the investigations carried on by Congress in order to direct them in the methods of the enforcement of the law. I think that any further expenditure of money to investigate subjects upon which the country is already informed is a waste of money. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. I hope the House will give this committee what they ask for to complete their investigation, which is, perhaps, the most important connected with our investigations of this Congress. There are matters of importance connected with that investigation that the committee have as yet to close up, and, as a consummation of their work, to report a bill of some kind, so that we may effectuate more stringently the laws now on our statute-book, or right them where they are deficient.

I notice in the journals that the committee are now making an inquiry which I think is far beyond what the House ever intended in regard to contract labor. I believe in the present law; and the very purpose in originating that committee was to carry out that law in relation to contract labor that comes in from abroad, with a view to protect the great body of our artisans, mechanics, and laborers of this country; but I see by the reports in the newspapers that the committee are now about to go further, and they are actually proposing to prevent foreign actors—the old Thespians—from coming into this country.

Mr. OATES. That is an open question with the committee. The committee have never settled that question.

Mr. COX. I am very glad that the committee have not; for I hope that our theaters shall not be restricted to the American player, but that we may have the privilege of seeing in tragedy, in comedy, in farce, in every position in which histrionic powers can be developed, every form in which any genius may come to us to give us delectation, in this city or elsewhere.

Mr. MCADOO. Or the ballet.

Mr. COX. Or the ballet.

I have noticed under this contract law they actually forbade a minister of the gospel, who came to one of the New York churches, from coming in and taking his pastorate because he had come under some contract or other.

I hope the committee will not carry this thing to excess. It is a very good thing. It is a very good thing to be a Christian, but it is not, therefore, necessary to join the Salvation Army in order to be a Christian. I would like the committee, since they have a limited appropriation, to call a halt on this cry against the introduction of foreign actors, and if they can modify the law as to the importation of laborers the main object of their labor will have been effected; and therefore, while I vote this money to increase the ability of this committee to make a report on their proper sphere, I hope they will receive in all good temper the objection which I make here with respect to foreign actors.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SOWDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions under the rule.

Mr. MCRAE introduced a bill (H. R. 11806) to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXI, clause 1, which provides that—

Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings before its passage, which shall be as follows: The first and second readings by title on introduction for reference, or, being original bills, on report from committees for commitment, except when the second reading in full shall be demanded by a member: Provided, That original bills on being reported by unanimous consent for present consideration shall be read the first time in full; the second and third time by title, unless the third reading in full shall be demanded by a member.

It seems to me that the portion of the rule which authorizes or requires the second reading of a bill in full on the demand of a member applies to original bills, or to reports from committees for commitment. It frequently happens that a subject is referred to a committee to be reported upon by bill or otherwise. Then, again, it sometimes happens that several bills on the same subject are referred to a committee, and the committee report a substitute for the original bills, which substitute is itself a new bill which has never theretofore been before the House. Now, having reached that stage, one member may call for the reading of the bill, and that is the meaning of the rule; but it can hardly be held that any member has a right to call for the reading of a bill when it is merely introduced for reference to a committee. If that were so, then, by the action of any one member, the power of the House to procure legislation might be entirely destroyed. Under this order of business he could prevent the consideration of any business or the introduction of any bills, other than his own. A member, when his State was called, might introduce a bill, or a number of bills in succession, and, by demanding their reading, prevent any one else from introducing a bill, and that might be kept up all through the session, and the House would be powerless to do business. It seems to me that our rules should receive a reasonable construction, and that that construction should be in the interest of the transaction of business and not such as to make them an impediment to the transaction of business.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], although he did not say that he rose to a point of order, but simply called the attention of the Chair to the provisions of Rule XXI, which provides:

1. Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings before its passage, which shall be as follows: The first and second readings by title on introduction for reference, or, being original bills, on report from committees for commitment, except when the second reading in full shall be demanded by a member: Provided, That original bills on being reported by unanimous consent for present consideration shall be read the first time in full; the second and third time by title, unless the third reading in full shall be demanded by a member.

The Speaker will observe that it is provided by the rule that original bills, on being reported by unanimous consent for consideration, shall be read the first time in full. The proviso to the rule seems to cover the action of the Chair on this point of order, and to imperatively require the reading of a bill on the demand of a member. A proviso is in the nature of an exception to a general rule. Had there been no proviso, still it might very well have been said that the rule itself should require that a bill should be read, because the rule provides that every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings before its passage, "which shall be as follows," and then it prescribes the order in which they shall come. Then comes this proviso:

Provided, That original bills, on being reported by unanimous consent for present consideration, shall be read the first time in full; the second and third time by title, unless the third reading in full shall be demanded by a member.

Now, this bill is introduced for consideration, and it is the right of the House to be instructed as to the character of the proposed legislation, and any member has a right to require the reading of the bill in order that the House, as well as the member who calls for the reading, may be informed in advance of the character of the legislation that is proposed; for it may be, Mr. Speaker, that a member of the House may desire to combat a bill in the committee to which it is referred; it may be that a member does not desire a favorable report upon a bill; it may be that he desires to appear before the committee for the purpose of urging either that there shall be an unfavorable report or that the bill shall be reported with certain amendments which he may suggest.

In addition to that, it is sometimes difficult for the House and difficult for the Speaker himself to determine the question of reference, and if a question should arise as to the committee to which a bill should be referred and the Speaker was doubtful about it and referred it to the House, no member would be prepared to vote intelligently or to say to what committee the bill should be referred unless, by the reading of it, he had obtained knowledge of its subject-matter and of the legislation which it proposed, whether original or amendatory of existing law. This rule requires that every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings. What does that mean? It means that on the first introduction of a bill any member shall have the right to have it read in order that he may become possessed and the House may become possessed of its character and of the legislation proposed in it. And, sir, the rule is a very salutary one, for the reason that much of the hasty legislation which passes Congress gets through here in consequence of the fact that bills are introduced and referred to committees and gravely considered by those committees and by their subcommittees and brought back to the House before most of the members of the House have learned anything about their character or provisions.

Generally speaking, the House has, and justly has, very great regard for the reports of its committees, because it presumes that every committee to whom a measure is intrusted will properly investigate the subject and will report the bill either favorably or unfavorably, as ought to be done by a committee looking to the legislative interests of the whole country. Therefore it is that occasionally unwise legislation will creep through the two Houses of Congress on account of the favorable reports of committees, or good legislation, in regard to the merits of which the House is profoundly ignorant, will fail by reason of the unfavorable action of committees; and this ignorance of the House in regard to measures which are to come before it for consideration may be facilitated if the ruling insisted upon by the gentleman from Illinois be sustained and the Chair should decide that a bill when introduced for the first time for reference can be read only by its title. In addition to that it might be possible that in particular cases the House, if informed in regard to the character of a measure, might desire to adopt the most prompt and effective parliamentary methods in order to insure its defeat; we might vote to reject a bill upon its first reading, thus waiving the necessity of reference to a committee and investigation by such committee. We might desire to consider and dispose of a bill at once by striking out the enacting clause or by any other prompt and decisive method by which bills may be summarily disposed of. Hence I insist that this bill and all others, when primarily introduced, should be read for the information of the House in order that we may understand the character of the legislation which any Representative or Delegate is insisting upon.

We are now just beginning the call of States for the introduction of bills and resolutions. A Representative from the State of Arkansas introduces a bill. I do not know from the title its purport or object. It may be possible that, with a proper understanding of its provisions, I might desire to have them extended to the State of Mississippi, and might wish to go before the committee for the purpose of asking an amendment of that character. Other members might desire to advocate similar amendments before the committee. Therefore we have a right to ask that bills when first introduced be read for the general information of the House and the Speaker, so that it may be ascertained where the bill should be referred, so that we may know the subject-matter of the bill, that the attention of members may be drawn to the class of legislation contemplated.

There is too much reliance placed upon committees in regard to the investigation of matters of this sort. While I have no doubt that our committees perform their duties to the extent of their ability and inform themselves thoroughly in regard to the measures referred to them, yet it may be that in some cases no one outside of the committee has such information. A bill remains in the keeping of a committee until they choose to make a report on the subject. Now, it may be I might desire to insist that the committee to which a particular bill is referred should make report upon it; and the information prompting me to take this course might be obtained from the full reading of the bill at the time of its introduction. I submit, therefore, there are many reasons why a bill when originally introduced should be read for the information of the House and in order to enlighten the mind of the Speaker as to the proper reference.

The SPEAKER. When this question was first presented the Chair was inclined to take the view urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]; but upon a more careful reading of the rule the Chair is satisfied that the exception at the end of the clause applies to both classes of bills previously mentioned; in other words, that the true construction is that bills shall be read a first and second time by their titles, whether introduced by a member for reference or reported as original bills from committees, except when the reading in full is demanded by a member of the House. When this demand is made, the Chair thinks the bill must be read in full, because the House may be called upon to vote on the question of the proper reference. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill (H. R. 11806), introduced by Mr. MCRAE, to settle certain accounts between the United States and the State of Arkansas was read in full.

The bill having been read a first and second time was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. BARNES. I introduce the bill which I send to the desk and ask to have it read.

The bill was read by its title, as follows:

A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the reading of this bill, which, I understand, is a bill already pending in the House, having been referred to one of its committees.

Mr. BARNES. This is a bill which was originally introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress; and I do not understand that it is pending in this Congress.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I rise to a question of information. How can we know that this bill is pending in the House unless it be read? It must be read in order to ascertain whether it is identical with any other bill now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The bill sent up by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNES] appears to be a bill which was introduced in the Forty-ninth Congress. The present occupant of the chair has no information whether any similar bill has been introduced in the present Congress, or what action may have been taken upon it.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I know of no such bill introduced in this Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Georgia has the right to introduce this bill and to have it read.

Mr. DUNHAM. Inasmuch as under the ruling of the Chair, which requires, upon the demand of any member, the reading of all these bills, it will be absolutely impossible for any other business to be done to-day unless some arrangement be made, I ask unanimous consent that the rule providing that this shall be a day for suspension of the rules be suspended, so that the House may go on with its regular business, the same as on any other day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think the House should cease to do business because one member chooses to take up the time to have read a bill which has been offered, not for the purpose of consideration, but merely to consume the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall insist on the regular order. I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he understands as matters stand we can not do any business in the House to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. DUNHAM. If this is suspended we can go on with the business as on any other day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I can answer the gentleman. The gentleman from Georgia intends to consume the time of the House to-day in order to prevent the members getting to the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. I am not doing anything of that sort.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, not the gentleman from Illinois, but the gentleman from Georgia who asks for the reading of this bill is. He is endeavoring to filibuster away the time of the House to prevent the Oklahoma bill being taken up for consideration and action.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 66.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. WARNER (interrupting). I wish, for the purpose of expediting legislation, to make this statement——

Mr. HOOKER. I am unable to hear what the gentleman from Missouri says.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman will in a moment.

Mr. HOOKER. Very well, then.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, the apparent if not the evident purpose of members in demanding the reading of these bills—to determine, as stated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], to what committee they may be referred, and in order that the minds of members may be informed as to the character of the legislation proposed—is to defeat the consideration of the Oklahoma bill. For one, sir, I believe that there is no more important piece of legislation before this House than the Oklahoma bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman from Missouri has no right to interrupt the reading of the bill, which has been decided to be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi object?

Mr. WARNER. I have a proposition to make, and wish merely to preface it with a few remarks.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER. I want but a moment.

Mr. HOOKER. If the gentleman is allowed to proceed, then I wish to have an opportunity to reply to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has said that he rose to make a point of order. He will state his point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. My point of order is, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri is interrupting the call of States for the purpose of making a speech in favor of a bill pending before the House; and with all respect to the gentleman I insist that he is out of order.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to reply to the point of order of the gentleman from Mississippi. I thought possibly my remarks might be as entertaining and as instructive and would take no more time than the reading of the bill; and especially as the consumption of the time is the purpose of the gentleman. I thought perhaps the point of order would not be raised. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I ask by unanimous consent, rather than stand in the way of the legislation of the House, and I ask as one of the friends of that measure, the Oklahoma bill, that it be temporarily laid aside in order that we may proceed with the other business of the House, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOOKER. Should it not be laid aside indefinitely?

Mr. WARNER. I have no doubt the gentleman from Mississippi would like to see that done. I have no doubt, too, many of the persons interested in the cattle syndicates would also like to see that done.

Mr. HOOKER. Could not the gentleman say something now in favor of the homeless and the landless?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether he makes this request for unanimous consent with a purpose later in the day to call up the Oklahoma bill?

Mr. WARNER. No, it is not my purpose later in the day, I will say to my learned friend from New York, to call up the Oklahoma bill to day. I know gentlemen desire to offer other bills, and I do not desire to deceive gentlemen in their innocence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Georgia demanded, as he had a right to demand, the reading of the bill, and until that demand is withdrawn only the reading of the bill is in order.

Mr. WARNER. But I hope the gentleman from Georgia will accept the suggestion I have made.

Mr. BARNES. With the understanding——

Mr. BLAND. We had better have the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will not insist upon that demand. It means that we will do nothing to-day.

Mr. BLAND. Well, we will strike something else further along, and I think we had just as well get on with what we are doing now.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, I think we can arrange this.

Mr. BARNES. With the understanding that the Oklahoma bill will not be taken up to-day, I am willing to withdraw the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will give my assurance as far as I can, and the assurance of the gentleman from Missouri as far as he can, that the Oklahoma bill will not be taken up to-day.

Mr. WARNER. I will certainly give mine.

Mr. BARNES. If it is understood, with the unanimous consent of the House, that the Oklahoma bill will not be taken up to-day, I will withdraw the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to give unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House can.

Mr. WARNER. I will say to the gentleman that I have the substitute bill in my possession, and that it will not be offered to-day.

Mr. BARNES. How about the other bill?

Mr. WARNER. No other bill on the subject of Oklahoma will be offered for consideration to-day.

Mr. BARNES. Then I withdraw the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is withdrawn.

REPORT OF THE HEALTH OFFICER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 241) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RULE XXI.

Mr. SPRINGER also submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule XXI be amended by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, That this order of business shall not extend beyond one hour on each Monday, except by unanimous consent."

MORANT CAY ISLANDS.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to furnish, for the information of this House, a copy of all declarations, memorials, letters, papers, and other documents on file in his Department in relation to the islands known as the Morant Cays, in the Caribbean Sea, pertaining to the United States, and especially all such declarations, memorials, letters, papers, and assignments as may have been filed in the Department of State by James W. Jewett, Prudencio de Murziundo, and Ward H. Lamon since January, 1866, and including a copy of any diplomatic correspondence in relation to said islands between the Government of the United States and that of Her Britannic Majesty which, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, may be made public without detriment to the public service.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. LAWLER introduced a bill (H. R. 11807) granting pensions to soldiers and sailors and widows of soldiers and sailors over fifty years of age; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAWLER. I introduced a similar bill to this one week ago, but the demand has been so general to change from sixty years to fifty years that I have thought it better to introduce a new bill on that subject fixing those years.

GRAND JURIES, ALASKA.

Mr. LYMAN introduced a bill (H. R. 11808) to provide for grand juries in the United States district court in and for the district of Alaska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ARKANSAS CITY, KANS.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (H. R. 11809) to construct a public building at Arkansas City, Kans., and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The State of Kansas was called.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement, with the consent of the House. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, having in charge the Pacific funding bill, and had an understanding from him that he would not to-day call up for suspension of the rules that bill; and I wish now to have the understanding of the House, he not being in his seat, the only reason for this being——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What is the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I did not observe that the chairman of the committee was in the Hall. I desire to have an understanding that the Pacific funding bill will not be called up to-day.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is what I agreed, that I would not call up the funding bill to-day; but, the gentleman will remember, I stated at the same time that I intended at all times to use all the exertions in my power to have a day fixed for its consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But the understanding was that there would be no motion to suspend the rules to-day.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Not, as I have said, to suspend the rules and pass the bill; but as to fixing the time for the consideration of the bill, I do not yield that privilege to anybody. It is my duty as chairman of the committee to make every effort to have it considered by the House, and I do not intend to be precluded from that privilege at any and all times. I have agreed with the gentleman simply that I will not endeavor to take up the bill to-day and pass it under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. With that understanding I will not introduce the bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore called the State of Kentucky.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. One word, Mr. Speaker. I perhaps did not hear what the gentleman from Ohio said, it has been suggested to me. Do I understand him to say that he would offer to-day a resolution to suspend the rules and fix a day?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I make no bargain with you, or any other member, as to when I will offer a resolution to fix a day for the consideration of the bill. But, as I have said, I will not attempt to-day to take up the bill and have it passed under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let him introduce his bill if he wants to.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I now introduce the bill——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The point of order I make is, that the State of Kansas has been called and passed, and the State of Kentucky called; therefore the bill can only be introduced by unanimous consent after the call of the States.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Kentucky had sent his bill up to the Clerk.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The bill had not been sent up.

Mr. SPRINGER. The title of the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] had been read by the Clerk, the State of Kansas having been passed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, I understand.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to state to the Chair that I waived my right because of misapprehension. I was advised at the time by some gentlemen of my misunderstanding of what the gentleman from Ohio had said, and I presume that as a matter of right and courtesy the point of order will not be pressed against my right to introduce the bill under these circumstances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas addressed the Chair, and then turned and addressed the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] and yielded the floor. After that the Chair called for the introduction of bills and resolutions from Kansas, and no one responded. The Chair then called Kentucky, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] sent up a bill. The gentleman from Kansas had yielded the floor, and the Chair having called the State of Kentucky can not now go back in the call of States except by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I object.

ZOOLOGICAL PARK, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11810) for the establishment of a zoological park in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, also introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 242) for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States in regard to polygamy and polygamous association or cohabitation between the sexes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I ask that that be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the proposed amendment to the Constitution be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BREWER. Is the gentleman referring to the bill which was read and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds? There was a bill of that kind which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. We have a precisely similar bill now before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution in regard to an amendment of the Constitution be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States in regard to polygamy or polygamous association or cohabitation between the sexes.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That it is deemed necessary by the two Houses of Congress to propose an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified, as hereby proposed, by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, the amendment hereby proposed to be numbered and to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. The marriage relation, by contract or in fact, between one person of either sex and more than one person of the other sex shall be deemed polygamy. Neither polygamy nor any polygamous association or cohabitation between the sexes shall exist or be lawful in any place within the jurisdiction of the United States or of any State.

"SEC. 2. The United States shall not, nor shall any State, make or enforce any law which shall allow polygamy or any polygamous association or cohabitation between the sexes, but the United States and every State shall prohibit the same by law within their respective jurisdictions.

"SEC. 3. The judicial power of the United States shall extend to the prosecution of the crimes of polygamy and of a polygamous association or cohabitation between the sexes under this article; and Congress shall have power to declare by law the punishment therefor.

"SEC. 4. Nothing in the Constitution or in this article shall be construed to deny to any State the exclusive power, subject to the provisions of this article, to make and enforce all laws concerning marriage and divorce within its jurisdiction, or to vest in the United States any power respecting the same within any State."

MADAGASCAR.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a resolution requesting the President to communicate to the House of Representatives any recent information in the Department of State relating to affairs in Madagascar; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let that be read.

The resolution was read.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF JAMES K. EDWARDS, ETC.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to the widow of James K. Edwards, deceased (late one of the Official Reporters of the House), the expenses of his last illness and funeral, not to exceed the sum of $500, and a further sum equal to six months of the salary which said Edwards was receiving at the time of his death.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That January 15, 1889, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of H. R. 3319, entitled "A bill to provide for post-office buildings."

Mr. ANDERSON (for Mr. CATCHINGS) (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 11811) to amend an act to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railway Company of the District of Columbia, which was received by the President August 10, and became a law without his approval; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let that be read.

The bill was read at length.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I ask to have the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order now.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman on the close of the call of States and Territories.

SUPREME COURT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask unanimous consent, as the State of Maryland was passed, to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not object.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11812) to invest the supreme court of the District of Columbia with jurisdiction over real estate of infants and lunatics in said District.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let the bill be read.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I consented that it should be introduced for reference only; not that it should be made an instrument of filibustering.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Whenever an attempt is made to lend $60,000,000 at 3 per cent. to a rich railroad company the gentleman from Kansas will filibuster.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

EQUALIZATION OF PAY OF HOUSE MESSENGERS.

Mr. McKINNEY introduced a resolution providing for the equalization of the pay of messengers of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, demanded the reading of the resolution, and it was read at length.

ACCOUNTS UNDER EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. BUCHANAN offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That Wednesday, December 19, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill No. 405, an act providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, etc., under the eight-hour law.

TARIFF.

Mr. FITCH introduced a bill (H. R. 11813) to modify existing laws relating to duties on imports and the collection of revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask that that bill be read.

The bill was read.

SECTIONS 5390 AND 5447, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. FARQUHAR introduced a bill (H. R. 11814) to further amend sections 5390 and 5447 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, demanded the reading of the bill, and it was read in full.

TARIFF AND INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXATION.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a bill. I introduce it by request, and do not wish to be regarded as obliged to support a single provision contained in it, but when it comes before us here I will then give its provisions fair consideration.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. In other words, the gentleman means to filibuster.

Mr. SPINOLA. I do not know about that, but I mean that they shall not get up the Nicaragua Canal bill to-day.

The bill introduced by Mr. SPINOLA was read by title, as follows: "A bill to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in connection with the revenue."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let that bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know how many pages there are in that bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROUT. Before that motion is put I wish to make a request. I have here a bill which is not a filibustering bill at all, which I should like to introduce for reference.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DUNHAM. I yield for that purpose.

TO MAKE POSTMASTERS ELECTIVE.

Mr. GROUT. This is a bill which I introduce in good faith and desire to have referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in the hope that it may be reported to the House at the present session.

The bill H. R. 11815, a bill to enable the people to name their postmasters, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. DUNHAM. I withdraw the motion temporarily to allow bills to be introduced that really mean business.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask for the regular order.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may send it up and it will be read by title, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The resolution was read as follows, and was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the 16th and 17th days of January, 1889, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported by the committee from the Judiciary, in such order as may be presented by said committee; this order, however, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA], a few moments ago, when his State was called, to send to the Speaker's desk a bill the reading of which has been demanded. That bill is now in the hands of the Clerk, and I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana demands the regular order; which amounts to an objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 53, noes 42.

Mr. JACKSON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 134, not voting 146; as follows:

The Clerk recapitulated the vote.

The following additional pairs were announced for the remainder of the day:

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. BOUTELLE.

Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, with Mr. NICHOLS.

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. DAVENPORT.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FULLER, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. COTHRAN, for ten days.

WITHDRAWAL OF BILL.

Mr. SPINOLA. The bill which I introduced by request I now desire to withdraw from further consideration.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON ELEVENTH CENSUS.

Mr. COX introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and they are hereby, instructed to report an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill providing for the payment of the clerk of the Committee on the Eleventh Census from the 4th day of March, 1889, to June 30, 1890, at the rate now provided by existing law.

REPEAL OF TOBACCO TAX, ETC.

Mr. COWLES introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report at an early day a separate bill making provision for the repeal of the tobacco tax, the retail license tax on dealers in spirituous liquors, and the other internal-revenue provisions of House bill No. 9051, known as "the Mills bill;" so that the same may be acted upon as a distinct proposition.

DISPUTED LAND-PATENTS, ETC., IN OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN introduced the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House what action, if any, has been taken by him in the matter of the cancellation or annulment of patents and lists of selections of lands heretofore granted by Congress and now claimed by The Dalles Military Wagon-Road Company in the State of Oregon, and whether any portion of said lands have been restored to the public domain for settlement.

SCHOOL LANDS, ETC., IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ATKINSON introduced a bill (H. R. 11816) to provide for the appropriation and valuation of land required for school and other purposes in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SQUARE SOUTH OF SQUARE 1092, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. ATKINSON (by request) also introduced a bill (H. R. 11817) vesting in the vestry of Christ Church, Washington parish, District of Columbia, all of the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to square south of square 1092, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SENIOR MEDICAL DIRECTORS, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill (H. R. 11818) for the relief of senior medical directors on the retired-list of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HOUK introduced a bill (H. R. 11819) for the relief of employés and late employés in the Post-Office Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS ON PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. LANHAM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the 11th and 18th days of January, 1889, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bills on the Private Calendar of the House, except pension bills, the consideration of which is already provided for at the Friday evening sessions.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE BUSINESS.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the 16th and 17th days of January, 1889, be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in such order as may be presented by said committee; this order, however, not to interfere with appropriation and revenue bills.

REPEAL OF TOBACCO TAX.

Mr. GAINES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report to this House one of the many bills already introduced for the repeal of the tax on tobacco.

LEWIS AND CLARKE EXPLORATIONS, ETC.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, presented the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That —— copies of the message of the President communicating discoveries made in exploring the Missouri, Red River, and Washita, by Captains Lewis and Clarke, Dr. Sibley, and Mr. Dunbar, 1806, be printed for use of the Fiftieth Congress, together with a map showing the country traversed by them as it is now known, upon which shall be traced a clear and distinct line showing the route followed by the explorers, Lewis and Clarke, etc.

LINCOLN LAND DISTRICT, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JOSEPH introduced a bill (H. R. 11820) to create the Lincoln land district in the Territory of New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SIOUX RESERVATION, DAKOTA.

Mr. PEEL (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 11821) to open and divide the great Sioux reservation in Dakota into smaller reservations, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UNAVAILABLE AND WORTHLESS ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, introduced a bill (H. R. 11822) directing the Treasurer of the United States to charge off certain unavailable and worthless accounts now standing on the books of the United States Treasury as cash balances, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ORDER OF AMERICA.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask, by request, to introduce a bill to incorporate the Military Order of America, and to have printed in the RECORD the petition which accompanies the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a private bill and will be referred, together with the petition, through the box.

OKLAHOMA BILL.

Mr. WARNER. I wish, in order that the Journal may be made up correctly, to state that in allowing the Oklahoma bill to go over it is with the understanding that it shall not lose any of its rights upon the Calendar; in other words, that it shall go over without prejudice and occupy its proper place upon the Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions is now concluded. The Clerk will read the bill coming over from the last suspension day, the motion being to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is next in order when the consideration of the same class of business has been resumed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.

Be it enacted, etc., That the amount heretofore fixed as a limit of the cost for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices by the United States Government in San Francisco, Cal., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $850,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as a limit of cost for the purchase of a site at voluntary sale or by condemnation.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners and officers of the United States Government having charge of the purchase of a site are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed.

Mr. MORROW. I ask that the amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the seventh line strike out "eight" and insert "six;" so it will read "$650,000" instead of "$850,000."

Mr. MORROW. When this bill was before the House on a previous occasion the hour for adjournment arrived while the question was pending on a demand for a second. I now ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules fifteen minutes' debate will be allowed on each side.

Mr. MORROW. I will only say, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the bill now before the House, that the purport of it is simply to increase the appropriation for the post-office at San Francisco by the amount of $300,000. Under the act of March 3, 1887, an appropriation was made of $350,000, and a commission, consisting of three persons, was authorized to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to make a selection of a suitable site.

That commission was duly appointed, and proceeded under the law to perform the duty. They have found several sites that they deem of value for the purpose of erecting this post-office upon in San Francisco, and have so reported to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary has made his report to this House, first sending in the report of the commission and secondly the report of the Department concerning the necessity for the erection of a post-office there.

The amount of $300,000 additional, proposed to be appropriated, is deemed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to be sufficient, although not what was recommended by the commission, and the Senate bill provided for an increase of the appropriation of $500,000. That bill has been amended in that particular so as to reduce the total to $650,000.

I do not desire to detain the House further, but will reserve the remainder of my time, and will give way to any gentleman who desires to be heard in opposition.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to ask the gentleman from California as to the amount provided for by this bill, and the circumstances under which the limit of the appropriation heretofore made has been increased.

Mr. MORROW. The bill which passed the House in March, 1887, had been pending before Congress for about ten years. The original amount proposed was $700,000, but General Rosecrans, then the Representative from San Francisco, deemed it advisable under all the circumstances to provide an appropriation of $350,000, and in the bill make provision also for the appointment of a commission to ascertain what a suitable site would cost. That is to say, it was not intended or expected that the sum of $350,000 would be sufficient to purchase an available site in the city of San Francisco at the time when that bill passed. When I came to Congress, in the Forty-ninth Congress, I found that the $350,000 bill had passed the Senate, and had at one time been considered by the House, but for some reason—because of technical proceedings in the last few days of the session—it did not pass. I introduced the bill precisely as I found it, which was passed, and the commission has been appointed by the Treasury Department, three able gentlemen from California, who have given the subject consideration, and their report has been transmitted to this body through the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MORROW. It must be remembered that we have no post-office building. The post-office is now located in the basement of the custom-house.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand this commission was appointed, and that they investigated the question of the purchase of a site?

Mr. MORROW. Yes, sir; and have made their report.

Mr. KILGORE. This bill is to appropriate a sum to buy a site, such as has been recommended by the commission?

Mr. MORROW. Not quite. They recommend $500,000, but the committee cut down their recommendations to $300,000, making the total appropriation $650,000.

Mr. WISE. I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas that I am familiar with the facts myself, as my friend from California knows, and I think this bill ought to pass. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless some gentleman desires to be heard in opposition to the bill, the Chair will submit the question to the House.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendment proposed by the committee, was agreed to, more than two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, where it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3612) donating condemned cannon and small-arms to Naval Post 400, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Committee on Military Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PEEL (when the Committee on Indian Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs be passed over in the call without prejudice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the same favor in regard to the Committee on the Public Lands.

There was no objection, and the order in each case was made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the same order be made with reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ADMISSION OF CERTAIN TERRITORIES.

Mr. SPRINGER (when the Committee on the Territories was called). By instruction of the Committee on the Territories, I offer the resolution I send to the desk, and move to suspend the rules and pass it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill numbered 185, being a bill to provide for the admission of the State of South Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota, and that said bill be made a special order to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole immediately after the reading of the Journal on to-morrow, and from day to day until disposed of, with leave to offer as a substitute therefor House bill 8466; and that thereafter other bills reported from said committee shall be in order in the House in like manner until disposed of, to be considered in the order fixed by the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution makes the bill a special order for to-morrow after the reading of the Journal, but to be considered from day to day until disposed of, so that I do not expect to call it up to-morrow.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is this reported by the Committee on the Territories?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. A matter which has been regularly referred to the committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. No——

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the bill that may be offered as a substitute?

Mr. SPRINGER. What is known as the "omnibus bill," embracing other Territories, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico.

I will ask, as soon as that order is made, to print some amendments which I propose to offer to the bill.

The present proposition is to take up the question of South Dakota, with leave to offer the others as a substitute. I have submitted it to the Delegate from Dakota and he sees no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. I wish to add that so far as Dakota is concerned this resolution is proper, and I trust it will pass.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if, in the amendment he proposes, there is not a provision to allow the people of the Territory to vote upon the question of division?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. It is a part of the proposition that Dakota can be divided if the people so desire.

Mr. REED. There is a provision that after we get through with that the Committee on Territories may go on with all their other bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. We have other bills. If this bill should be voted down, there are more bills making provision for the admission of the Territories.

Mr. REED. Your resolution covers all possible business of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SPRINGER. We desire to have these bills considered, and they are all subject to the question of consideration.

Mr. REED. I simply want to call attention to the fact that this thing is loaded.

Mr. SPRINGER. We want to dispose of this business before we close, and therefore we ask that it shall cover all the bills.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are gentlemen here who did not understand the reading of the resolution, and I ask that it be again read.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. PETERS. I suggest that that be amended so as to say "other bills in relation to the admission of Territories."

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COX. Let the last clause be read as it is proposed to amend it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The last clause will read: "That thereafter other bills in relation to the admission of the Territories reported from the said committee shall be in order in the House in like manner until disposed of, to be considered in the order fixed by the committee."

Mr. SPRINGER. That is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. REED. It is understood that all other legitimate amendments may be offered?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. It shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, which will admit any proper amendment. I desire to say to the gentleman that opportunity will be given to test the sense of the House by yea-and-nay votes upon every substantial proposition that the minority of the Committee on Territories desire to have a vote taken on.

Mr. REED. Why, then, do you ask for special leave to make the substitution?

Mr. SPRINGER. Because it would not be in order to make it unless we did so.

Mr. REED. Why do you not take up Dakota Territory separately and let us dispose of it at once?

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a bill pending in the Committee on Territories in regard to South Dakota. It would not be in order to move an amendment to that, except as relating to Dakota, unless this express leave shall be granted to embrace other Territories.

Mr. REED. Why do you not take up South Dakota and pass that, and go on to the others?

Mr. SPRINGER. That will be a matter the House can determine, if the majority is in favor of doing so.

Mr. REED. You can certainly ask unanimous consent. You want to go through the motion of attending to this Territorial business, and yet not attending to it at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not hear what the gentleman says.

Mr. REED. I think you have got my idea. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not catch it unless I hear, and frequently I can not catch it after I hear. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, there is such confusion that I do not understand the whole terms of the resolution. I therefore ask that it be reported again.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman who offered the resolution whether under that rule it will be in order for any other amendment concerning any other Territories than those contained in the House bill which was named?

Mr. SPRINGER. I so understand—that the bill will be open for any proper amendments. It is with a view to having the subject so enlarged that amendments can come in regarding the other Territories, so that the House can have a yea-and-nay vote to settle every one of these propositions. I will ask when the bill is up for such a fair consideration of it and such votes upon it as will test and bring out an expression of opinion in relation to every possible question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There was a doubt in my mind—I do not profess to be a parliamentarian—whether under the terms of that resolution the offering of a substitute such as that House bill finally complied with its terms and excluded and exhausted all the terms of the order. If the construction put upon it by the gentleman from Illinois be a true one, then I have no objection.

Mr. COX. I would ask of the gentleman from Illinois this question——

Mr. REED. Of course everybody knows what this is. It is an effort to appear to desire to admit the Territory, but to complicate it with other matters. It will be made to appear when it is before the House.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Maine will be wrong in his conclusions as to that. I think it will be a patriotic matter with both parties, and that such amendments can be made that we can get the judgment of the best men of both sides of the House.

Mr. REED. If it was in the hands of the gentleman from New York I believe we could reach it fairly.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman for his compliment; but I think it is in safe hands now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the second shall be considered as ordered? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the second is ordered.

The resolution was then agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in bill form some amendments which I shall offer to this bill at the proper time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COX. I suggest that there be included in that unanimous consent for the reprinting of the majority and minority reports on this subject.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report on the "omnibus bill" includes them all. It is House Report 1025.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. COX, and it was so ordered.

SITE FOR CITY POST-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10406) for the purchase of square 489, in the city of Washington, as the site for the post-office, and other Government uses.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill for the purchase of square 489, in the city of Washington, as the site for the post-office, and other Government uses.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide, square 489, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, as the site for a city post-office, and for other Government uses. The said site shall not exceed in cost the sum of $430,000, and for the acquisition thereof the said sum of $430,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That in case the Secretary of the Treasury shall be unable to purchase the whole of the said square he shall enter into a contract or contracts of purchase with so many of the owners of parcels of the said square as are willing to dispose of the same, at such price or prices as he deems reasonable, and as will leave remaining an ample sum to meet the expenses of acquiring the remaining parcels by condemnation, within the limit of cost hereinbefore provided; and in each and every such contract of purchase there shall be inserted a proviso that the same shall not be binding upon the United States unless a good and valid title to the whole of the real estate embraced in the said square shall be acquired by the United States at a cost not exceeding the said sum of $430,000; and he shall proceed to acquire the remaining parcels by condemnation, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in the mode prescribed by an act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library," approved April 15, 1886, and full jurisdiction in the premises is hereby vested in the said court: Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the acquisition of the said site, or any part thereof, until a valid title to the same shall be vested in the United States.

Mr. BREWER. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds where this square is situated.

Mr. DIBBLE. It is a square immediately west of and across the street from Judiciary Square. It embraces 75,000 square feet. It is bounded by Fifth and Sixth and D and E streets. It was agreed upon by a majority of the committee, after discussing all the sites suggested; and it is decidedly the cheapest suitable site for the purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ADAMS. I am not opposed to this bill, but in order to obtain an explanation of it I demand a second. I do not, however, object to having a second considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is about a million dollars involved in this bill, is there not?

Mr. DIBBLE. The bill appropriates $430,000, if so much be necessary, for the purchase of this site.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KILGORE. I shall have to object. I think we have done enough to-day towards appropriating money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that we shall waste the rest of the day upon this motion, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

The tellers took their places; and pending the count,

Mr. SPRINGER withdrew the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this motion the ayes are 80 and the noes are 2. The ayes have it——

Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest to the Chair that the rule expressly provides that less than a quorum can not order a second. I do not mean by this suggestion to antagonize the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE]; I simply desire that we shall adhere to what I think has hitherto been the uniform ruling of the Speaker on this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted, and the tellers will resume their places.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order when the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that as the tellers had already reported before the motion to adjourn was made, the motion is in order.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 70, noes 76.

Mr. BLOUNT. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Pending the question on ordering the yeas and nays, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota.

SITE FOR CITY POST-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] demands the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 127, not voting 139; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. SPRINGER objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The following additional pairs were announced for the rest of the day:

Mr. LANHAM with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCCREARY). The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point of order that the vote must now be taken over from the beginning, business having intervened between the former announcement and the present proceeding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that will be the order.

Mr. SOWDEN and Mr. DIBBLE objected.

Mr. KILGORE. But I have made the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken. Those voting in the affirmative will again pass between the tellers and be counted.

Mr. DIBBLE. Does the Chair mean that the vote now be taken de novo?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir.

The question was again taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes none.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. ENLOE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not like to make the point of order, because I voted to adjourn; but under the rules another motion to adjourn is not now in order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point that under the rules no further dilatory motion is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would be glad myself to have the House adjourn, but I have made the point because I am not willing to see the motion entertained contrary to the rules.

Mr. ENLOE. I think the decision of the Chair was that the former motion to adjourn was not made in the regular order, and this motion to adjourn is now in order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call the attention of the Chair to the eighth clause of Rule XVI.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. This point of order is the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that when no quorum has voted the only motion in order is to adjourn or for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the eighth clause of Rule XVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

Mr. BLAND. The vote has been taken, and the House found itself without a quorum.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. A quorum having failed to vote on the question of ordering a second, the Chair is of opinion that nothing is now in order except a motion to adjourn or for a call of the House. In the judgment of the Chair, the motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I respectfully ask the Chair to reconsider that ruling. The case of a motion to suspend the rules is an exception from the general rule in regard to a motion to adjourn. If the Chair will notice the language of the clause just read, he will find that after one motion to adjourn has been put no other can be entertained until the vote is taken on suspension. The vote just taken was on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The language of the rule will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House do adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is not able to decide that is a dilatory motion. He thinks, therefore, the motion to adjourn is in order, and feels compelled to put the motion to the House.

Mr. OATES. It seems to me perfectly plain that although but one motion to adjourn is in order pending a motion to suspend the rules, yet the fact that no quorum is developed——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has so ruled, and the question now is on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 23.

Mr. SOWDEN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds now has the call for the suspension of the rules. The next time this business comes up, I ask, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether that committee will not have the floor?

Mr. WEAVER. I would not like that understood as against some other committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair will state that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has a proposition which was passed over temporarily.

Mr. DIBBLE. But subsequent to that does not the call of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds come next afterward?

Mr. ENLOE. The decision of the present Speaker would be nothing more than presumptive evidence.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. WHEELER (by request): A bill (H. R. 11851) to incorporate the Military Order of America—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. E. P. ALLEN: Resolutions of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, in favor of House bills Nos. 11027 and 11266, for pure lard—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., in favor of national bureau of health—to the Committee on Education.

Also, resolution of the same in favor of the cental or decimal system of weights and measures—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. BIGGS: Petition of Samuel C. Watters, of San Joaquin, Cal., in favor of pure lard—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BLISS: Resolutions of the Maritime Association of New York, for appropriations for the support of the branch hydrographic offices at the principal seaports of the country—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. BREWER: Petition of C. L. Taylor, of Clinton County, Michigan, in favor of pure food and pure lard—to the Committee on Agriculture.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 10, 1888, a report from the Chief of Engineers as to the action taken by the Board of Engineers appointed under the provisions of the river and harbor act of August 11, 1888, to examine the obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River at The Dalles and Celilo Falls and at Three and Ten Mile Rapids; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of Harriet H. Robinson, of Malden, Mass., praying the Congress of the United States to remove her disabilities. The petition is accompanied by a bill for that purpose. I ask that the petition and bill may be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, and that both petition and bill be printed. The petition is very short, and it represents the views of a large number of our fellow-citizens. I think it proper that it should be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the petition will be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, and ordered to be printed. The bill will lie on the table until that order is reached.

Mr. CAMERON presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., favoring the establishment and maintenance of a national bureau of health; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., favoring the adoption of the decimal system as applied to weights and measures; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal., with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 3728) authorizing the Midland Railroad Company to build a bridge over White River at Aberdeen, Ark.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3729) for the establishment of a pure-food division in the Department of Agriculture, to provide for the inspection of live-stock about to be slaughtered at slaughter-houses, canning, salting, packing, and rendering establishments, the carcasses or products of which are intended for human consumption in any State or Territory other than where slaughtered, or for exportation to foreign countries, to prohibit the introduction of adulterated or misbranded food or drugs into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or foreign country, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3730) to relieve John Friedlin from the charge of desertion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 3731) to provide for a special sanitary inspector in the Marine-Hospital Service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3732) granting the right of way to the Pensacola and Memphis Railroad Company over and through the public lands of the United States in the States of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Tennessee, and granting the right of way to said railroad company over and through the United States naval and military reservation near Pensacola, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3733) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and to provide for writs of error in capital cases, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 3734) to authorize the construction of a bridge or bridges across the Mississippi River at La Crosse, Wis.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAWES introduced a bill (S. 3735) to relieve the political disabilities of Harriet H. Robinson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the names of all persons (other than laborers) promoted or appointed without competitive examination, since the 1st of March last, to positions in the customs service at customs districts, "where the whole number of clerks and persons employed shall be altogether as many as fifty," under the authority, or otherwise, of the fifth subdivision of the second customs rule approved by the President February 2, 1888, or any subsequent modification or change thereof, stating in the case of each appointment or promotion the modification or change in the customs rules, if any.

EVENING SESSIONS—HOUR OF MEETING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no other resolutions, concurrent or other, the order of morning business is closed and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I introduced yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL December 17, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter the Senate will hold evening sessions, and for that purpose will take a recess from 5.30 o'clock p. m. to 8 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution. I move to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That, until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I fully appreciate the present condition of affairs considered from a political standpoint in regard to the pending tariff measure, and in what I shall say I speak entirely for myself and in regard to my own personal situation.

It is very well known that prior to our adjournment just before the election it was in the nature of things simply impossible for those of us upon this side of the Chamber who were not members of the Finance Committee to scrutinize the items of the different schedules in the tariff bill.

It is also very well known that those of us who did not represent manufacturing States could not be and were not familiar with the expert business of a tariff bill. Whilst we were as competent then as we are to-day to discuss the general principles of tariff legislation, as to the minutiæ and details of such a measure, in the very nature of things, it was simply out of the question that we should have been as familiar with those details as Senators representing States whose constituents were directly and peculiarly interested in tariff legislation.

It goes without saying also that those of us who are not members of the Finance Committee could not have been as familiar with the details as the committee itself, which for more than two months was engaged in preparing the schedules and classifications.

Speaking for myself, however, I left the Senate a week before the adjournment, or eight days before, to be accurate, and I went into the canvass and spoke every day except Sundays from that time until the election. I had no time to examine the schedules. It was simply out of the question that I should have done so.

On account of the sickness of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] work has been devolved upon some of us on this side of the Chamber which has been most irksome, but it had to be performed; and now for this Senate to change its rule, meet at 11 o'clock, then again at 8, and expect us to do justice to this question, to the details of the bill, is simply cruel and outrageous, and I use the terms with their full significance. For my part, I can not do it, and I will not do it.

I have stated to the chairman of the committee and I say it here honestly (and I believe my personal character will induce every Senator on the other side to believe it), we have no disposition to make factious opposition to the bill. I believe I represent this side of the Chamber and can do it that far without speaking in any authoritative or official way, but as a Senator, when I say that all we want is fair, legitimate investigation and discussion. We do not propose that the bill shall go through here as a matter of course. We do not propose on the other hand to use any unfair or unparliamentary means to delay it for a minute; but if Senators with their majority want now to force us to sit here day and night, I tell them they can not do it.

I want the matter to be disposed of in that spirit of fairness and friendship which should characterize the discussion of so great and important a subject. But this proposition is beyond all reason. It is simply impossible, so far as I am concerned, for me to go through this work, and I do not intend to do it in this kind of a fashion.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the only purpose of this resolution is to enable the Senate to do the business of the session in an intelligent and proper manner.

So far as the Senate tariff bill is concerned, I do not believe that there was ever any tariff bill presented before in the Senate that had received such special and elaborate attention as that bill has received. I suppose that the Senator from Missouri, and other Senators, have given in detail on the hustings the difference between the Democratic party and the Republican party in relation to the tariff, and also as to the details of what is called the Mills bill and what was proposed by the Senate committee.

I do not, therefore, think that we ever have had a bill where Senators had such an opportunity and have so embraced that opportunity to consider in detail every item that is under discussion as they have in the present bill.

We all know that this is a short session, and that the regular appropriation bills require much of our time. It is therefore indispensable that the tariff bill should be gotten out of the way in order to consider the regular, legitimate business of the session in relation to appropriation bills.

I do not think the Senator from Missouri quite estimates with his usual fairness the position that we occupy on this subject. There is no disposition on the part of this side of the Chamber to take any advantage, but to give all opportunity that is needed and necessary for the discussion and consideration of the present bill. Sessions at 11 o'clock and evening sessions heretofore have been very common. I do not think it is unusual to ask it.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say a single word, and then I am done with this matter.

It is hardly necessary for me to say to the Senator from Vermont that I have the greatest respect for him personally, and the kindest feeling possible; but he was never more mistaken in his life than in his statement as to the opportunity to examine the details of the bill. When the measure was reported prior to the recess I was myself so much at a loss to know the changes that had been made that I was dependent entirely upon the reports of experts of the Treasury Department and the reports of the committees. Those reports came to our hands—came to my hands, at any rate, the last of them, two days before I left the city of Washington to go into the canvass, and until I returned here I knew nothing really in regard to all the changes made in tariff legislation by the pending substitute.

The Senator is utterly mistaken when he says time was given us to examine the details. I was unable in my canvass and in discussions upon the hustings to point out the changes that had been made. I knew from reports of experts what was the aggregate change or increase of duty upon the cotton and woolen schedules, but as to any such information as the Senator from Vermont alludes to, I did not have it, and could not have it, and I doubt whether any Senator on this side of the Chamber had it.

Mr. President, it is an open secret that the Republican majority in the Senate have determined upon taking no Christmas holiday recess. The first movement here is to have night sessions, commencing to-night.

Mr. MORRILL. Commencing to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. Commencing to-morrow; I stand corrected. The next movement is to take no Christmas holiday recess. The next is to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning. We are to be put through this bill under whip and spur in a parliamentary way, and it is unfair and unjust; and I tell Senators now it can not be done.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I desire to say that the history of the substitute bill shows that it was over two months in preparation by the subcommittee of the Senate, composed entirely of the friends of the bill. I do not mean that the subcommittee was composed entirely of the friends of the bill, but that portion of the subcommittee which framed the bill. No member of the opposition was consulted. They were over two months in the preparation of the bill, and it has been boasted of here again and again as to the care and the pains which were taken in the preparation of the bill. The Senator from Vermont says that probably a tariff bill never was framed with more preparation than this measure has had.

If that preparation refers to the caring for the interests of the particular class affected by the bill, the Senator from Vermont and all others who have boasted of the preparation of the bill are correct. They had before them almost every manufacturer, or a representative of every manufacturing interest in the United States, who, of course, understood their own business. They heard them, and the bill has been prepared in obedience to their suggestions and at their request. They stood around that committee-room door, and thronged the table of the subcommittee as hungry dogs stand around a kitchen door waiting for the cook to shake the table-cloth; and the bill has been formed in their interests.

The interests of the consumers were not consulted. No consumer simply was there or invited there that I know anything of. The interests of the Government of the country whose taxing power they are abusing were not consulted. Out of the three hundred and fifty witnesses whose testimony has been published, who told the same story with damnable iteration about their inability to endure competition and who desired the duty to be fixed at a certain point, there was not one whose business simply was to pay the taxes which were imposed, and there is not a reference to the revenues of the Government except incidentally as a matter of smaller concern.

Nobody on this side had an opportunity to examine the details of the bill which they took more than two months to prepare. It is full of adroit contrivances to raise the duties so as to deceive the people. In the very matter which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] asked yesterday to have left open, about fencing-wire, under the present law the number of wire which usually is employed for building the farmers' fences throughout the country came in under the head of "iron manufactures not otherwise provided for" at 40 per cent. Instead of openly placing that article upon the dutiable-list and increasing the duty upon it, instead of the present law on wire not smaller than No. 5 wire gauge, they now say "all wire not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge," the effect of which is to take it out of the 45 per cent. clause and put it up from 40 to 47 per cent.

How is the great majority of Senators on this side to ascertain those things? We have not had the manufacturers to consult with. We have not had the importers to consult with.

A very few days after the bill was brought into the Senate Congress adjourned; its members all dispersed to take part in the Presidential canvass; and the moment they are reassembled, instead of proceeding orderly in the regular business hours of the Senate and giving Senators who are disposed to acquire the information necessary the opportunity to study of evenings at home and to acquire what information they can, it is now proposed to begin at 11 o'clock in the morning and continue, after a recess, until an indefinite hour in the night.

They have prepared themselves; they and their friends, the manufacturers, have got their lesson, and we are to be forced in this way, without an opportunity even at night to acquire the information that is necessary for us to dispose of the bill properly, without even a Christmas holiday. Everything is to be done to force the tariff bill through, so as to preclude the possibility of one which can be made in the interests of the people.

I for one will do the best I can to expose its iniquities, but if I am allowed neither day nor night to study the bill and to acquire the information, and if I am to sit at my desk and watch the operations of the wicked, I do not know what good I can do, but I will do the best I can. However, I say that it is not fair; it is not proper, it is not just or right, viewed in any light, to hurry the bill through in this way by caucus action.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the question of the revision of the tariff and the reduction of the revenue is not a new question to either side of this Chamber. The President of the United States, one year ago, made it the only and sole topic of his message. The House of Representatives took up the question, I agree, with great leisure, and sent us a bill which we received on the 25th day of July. We received it formally on the 21st, I believe, but it was not printed for our examination until the 25th. It was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Finance consisting of Senators representing both sides of this Chamber.

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from North Carolina state that the minority had no opportunity of examining the bill until nearly the time of adjournment last fall. In a sense that is true. I need not go into details, but will simply say that substantially the bill was prepared by the Republican members of the Committee on Finance on that subcommittee. In its preparation, however, the committee called to its aid experts for the purpose of interpreting existing law as to ad valorems, and also the Mills bill, and so far as possible to interpret the substitute which was proposed by the Republicans of the majority.

The bill substantially as it is now was reported to the full committee on the 25th day of September, and from that time until this moment the Democratic members of the Finance Committee have had full access to every detail respecting the bill, as they had full access during all the prior period to all the testimony taken by the subcommittee. There never was a moment in the preparation of the bill when any member of the minority of the Finance Committee could not have been placed in possession of everything that was in the possession of the majority, and as a matter of fact a large amount of the testimony was in the hands of the minority.

The bill was reported to the full committee on the 25th day of September. On that day it was made public, that is to say, not only the Finance Committee but every Senator was placed in possession of a copy of the bill, and the public press was placed in possession of copies of it. Immediately the experts of the House of Representatives who had prepared the Mills bill were put in possession of a copy of the Senate bill, and with reasonable haste and some degree of accuracy that bill was criticised by the experts of the House of Representatives in print and in detail. All its defects and imperfections were held up to the public gaze in print and in newspapers and on the rostrum and in this Chamber, and the Senator from North Carolina was not slow to come forward in this illumination, not only in his own State but elsewhere.

That dissection (if I may be permitted to use that term) of the bill was placed in the hands of every Democratic Senator in this Chamber, referring in detail to the changes proposed in the bill by paragraphs and by sections, and its enormities were held up.

Not only that, but the Treasury Department itself was invoked with all its expert machinery, with all its knowledge as respects the details of the bill, and as my venerable friend [Mr. DAWES] suggests, with all its zeal. In other words, all the machinery of every name and nature, political and expert, was put in motion from the 25th day of September, and now we have upon our tables a detailed dissection of the bill by the Treasury Department and also by the experts of the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, with all the advantage of this knowledge which is in the hands of Senators, I can but repeat what was so well said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], that there never has been a time when a bill was so thoroughly understood on both sides of the Chamber and by every member on both sides of the Chamber as this bill——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Iowa state when the evidence taken by his committee was printed for the use of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. The evidence?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly I will state it. The evidence was printed in slips as we went along, as rapidly as it could be printed, and therefore——

Mr. VEST. Was that for distribution?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator. And therefore it was accessible to those who were examining and preparing to examine this bill. Of course these slips were not assembled until after the bill was reported to the Senate, and I believe the testimony was not reported to the Senate until a few days before the final adjournment in October.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was ready, on the third day after the bill was reported, for distribution to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I had forgotten that.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not distributed at all then.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was ready on that day and distributed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Missouri who now sits in front of me received a copy on that day.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not at all.

Mr. VANCE. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to make a statement?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to say that I did not receive a copy of the testimony so far as it had been printed, for it is not all printed yet, I understand.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

Mr. VANCE. The subcommittee is still in operation.

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

Mr. VANCE. And I did not receive that until the Tuesday after the Monday on which we assembled at this session. I did not receive the statistical analysis of the Senate bill from the Treasury Department until the Wednesday following. I did not receive the analysis made by the expert of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House until yesterday one week ago; and if the Senator thinks that within that time I could have taken in all the information by intuition, he does me honor overmuch.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, of course no member of the Finance Committee went around as a sort of colporteur distributing these reports or distributing the bill and the testimony. Especially was that not true of the members of the Committee on Finance when our committee-room was lumbered up with these documents. It was so full sometimes that it was with difficulty we could get around the tables and chairs. Everybody had access to them who wanted those papers. Of course the Senator from North Carolina did not do it if his occupations were such that he did not have time to engage in this investigation. I can readily see that he might require a little more time, but I submit to him that there never has been such preparation for the convenience of Senators as is disclosed in these tables and documents; and I think the skillful way in which the Senator from North Carolina thus far has handled the various questions involved discloses that he has not kept his eyes shut during the last ten days. He has had some opportunity either late in the morning or early in the evening to investigate these tables and know what he is doing, and I repeat that this investigation was continued in such a way as to give the fullest information respecting the subject.

One word further. The House of Representatives have sent to us a resolution for a recess from the 21st day of this month until the 7th of January. There will then remain less than two months of this session of Congress. It is perfectly manifest to me, and it seems to me it must be to every Senator on this floor, that if our revenue bill is to go to the House of Representatives and to be considered by it, it must go over early in the month of January; and if there is any possibility of reaching a conclusion as to the differences that we know exist between these two Houses, it is necessary that the measure, so far as the Senate is concerned, shall reach the House of Representatives by the middle of January. If we do not go on and consider the bill as rapidly as we can now, discussing it as Senators feel inclined to discuss it, it is manifest that sooner or later, certainly by the middle of January or the 1st of February, this bill must be laid aside and the necessary appropriation bills must be considered in this body.

I know perfectly well that with the Senate Chamber evenly balanced as it is between the two political parties, having but one or two majority on this side of the Chamber, if the Senator from Missouri fairly represents the other side in the threat which he makes this morning, if we undertake to proceed orderly and regularly with diligence with this bill, I have no doubt that threat thus early made can be successfully used to defeat the bill. I know perfectly well that we can not go on and consider this bill unless we have the practical co-operation and, I may say, the cordial co-operation of that side of the Chamber as respects the consideration of it. They can throw impediments in its pathway that will prevent its consideration by this Chamber. They can make us sit here from the 1st or the 7th day of January without progressing beyond a single paragraph of the bill. We spent yesterday, the entire day until 5 o'clock, practically upon a single paragraph of this bill.

With a bill having six or seven hundred paragraphs everybody knows if these impediments are to be put in the way we can not go on with the bill, but if that is understood it must be demonstrated on this floor, it seems to me. I know the Senator from Missouri yesterday said to me that there was no object on that side of the Chamber to secure delay in this matter; that all they desired was reasonable debate and discussion. I am bound to take, as I do, that statement as meaning exactly what it implies, but yet when we undertake to make progress with this bill, when we propose that during its consideration we shall practically give up the time of the Senate to it in order that it may be sent to the House of Representatives for its examination and consideration, we are confronted with the statement that if we are diligent we shall meet with the obstructions here which we know can be put in its pathway.

So far as I am concerned—and I believe that is the understanding on this side of the Chamber—the purpose is that this order shall be executed fairly, and only fairly; that we shall go on from day to day with as much diligence as possible. Certainly we can begin work at 11 o'clock each day; we can go on until half past 5, and we can work two or three hours in the evening on this bill and get it out of the way, and then the other necessary business of this session can be considered. That is what I understand to be the object of this resolution this morning.

Mr. HARRIS obtained the floor.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to say one word in answer to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, I will.

Mr. ALDRICH. In response to what the Senator from North Carolina said in regard to his ignorance of the provisions of this bill, I beg to say that as early as the 4th of October last a report was submitted to the Senate to which the name of the Senator from North Carolina was appended, criticising in detail this bill; and if it was only a week ago that he learned of its provisions, it is singular that he allowed his name to be used in connection with the minority report.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator from Rhode Island very well knows the circumstances under which that report was made. He knows that that report was made in two days after the bill had been placed in our hands and that the minority of the Finance Committee begged for more time but could not get it. They made their report upon the best information that was obtainable; and it seems that even in that they had to depend upon the statements of the majority report, that they were mistaken in some very important items, showing the necessity of giving them more time; and the necessity for more time now is quite apparent.

The task on this side of the Chamber is a very different one from the task on that side. There they have nothing to do but record the will of the manufacturers that has been expressed to them. They are satisfied with this bill. It is their bill. But we represent the consumers. We to some extent represent also the Treasury of the United States and the Government of the country, and we must inquire what sixty million of consumers want, and therefore the task is more difficult upon our side, and justice requires that we should have more time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Just one word on another question of fact. The Senator from North Carolina said the minority only had two days. The bill was submitted to the full committee on the 25th of September, and every member of the minority was furnished with a copy of the bill. The report was not made until the 4th of October, nine days after, instead of two.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there is certainly no disposition on this side of the Chamber to unnecessarily delay the consideration of this bill. Upon the contrary, so far as I am able to understand the disposition of this side of the Chamber, it is to proceed with it just as rapidly as we can arrive at satisfactory conclusions as to the effect of its provisions. But exactly why this new-born and unprecedented zeal in the effort to railroad this bill through without time for full discussion and proper consideration, is what I do not quite comprehend, and that it is absolutely unfair and unjust to this side of the Chamber is a matter about which there can be no doubt.

Now, as a matter of fact, known to the Senator from Iowa and every other Senator of the majority of the Committee on Finance, there was not a member of even the subcommittee belonging to this side of the Chamber who knew a word or a line that this substitute contained until it was reported to the full committee on the 25th day of September. It being stated in the committee when the bill was reported to the full committee that the substitute then reported was agreed upon by the majority of the committee, the committee decided not to discuss it item by item, but simply to read it and report it to the Senate. It was reported to the full committee on the 25th of September and to the Senate on the 3d of October. The majority of the subcommittee having spent weeks and weeks in the preparation of this substitute and their argumentative report in favor of the substitute, when the bill was reported to the full committee the minority being urged day by day and hour by hour to put in their views, had, as the Senator from North Carolina has stated, but a couple of days. Perhaps, however, the Senator from Rhode Island may be correct, and a larger number of days after we first saw the substitute as reported may have been allowed.

When the bill was reported to the Senate a general debate was commenced upon it. We were in the midst of a Presidential contest, and I suppose the great majority of Senators on both sides of this Chamber were very much interested in the issues of that contest. The long and carefully-studied preparation of the substitute by the Republican members of the committee had thoroughly familiarized them with every phase and every feature and every detail of the bill, but those phases and features and details were as new to the Democratic members of that committee as they were to every other Senator, and there has been no time for the members of the committee on this side of the Chamber to familiarize themselves with the various details and the effects of the various changes made by this substitute, not only changes as to the amount of taxation, but changes in classification and changes from ad valorems to specifics, and sometimes attaching both duties, specific and ad valorem.

The Senator says we have had experts to analyze it. That is true, but the reports of the experts did not come to my hands until the meeting of this session, when they came to the hands of other Senators on this and I suppose on the other side of the Chamber. It requires time for those of us who have not had months and months of study and preparation to thoroughly comprehend the effect of the various provisions that this substitute contains.

As a matter of fact, the Senator from Iowa very well remembers, or if he will look to the RECORD and refresh his memory he will find that when the tariff revision of 1883 was under consideration in this body the bill was not reported from the Finance Committee to the Senate until about or after the middle of January, but this bill has been under consideration from the beginning of this session, having been debated for a week or two before the adjournment of the last session. We are confronted this morning with a proposition that we shall meet at 11 o'clock every morning; proceed with the consideration section by section and paragraph by paragraph until half past 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and then, after a session of six hours and a half, take a recess until 8 o'clock and return to the Chamber and again proceed with the consideration and discussion of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly. I always allow the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that the Senator has entirely mistaken the purpose of this resolution. It is not to railroad the bill through; it is to give more time for its consideration; is so that the Senators may have more time to consider it in detail and in all its bearings. It is not for the purpose of railroading the bill through; it is to insure consideration to the extent possible that time will give.

Mr. HARRIS. The consideration, Mr. President, at my private table is a little more satisfactory to me than the consideration that is given upon this floor, and the time can be much more profitably employed there than here. But need I remind the Senator from Massachusetts, or any other Senator on that side of the Chamber who has had even two years' experience on this floor, that a night session would prove an utter failure and an utter waste of time? Do you suppose you would have a quorum here at any one moment of the time during your night sessions, by the vote of which you could decide anything?

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me a night session would be an exceedingly good time for the study of the bill. It might not be a good time to vote, but to study the provisions of the bill, and understand their bearing—a capital time.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, these utterances and the provisions of this resolution may read well in the RECORD. An argument may be predicated upon them tending to show that that side of the Chamber is eagerly anxious to do something upon the revenue question, which they have not exhibited a desire to do for many a long year heretofore. But you will not facilitate the consideration, you will not facilitate the passage of the bill by this effort to have a meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning and then to hold night sessions each night after a session of six hours and a half in the day. Every Senator on that side of the Chamber as well as on this side who has had an experience of two years upon this floor knows it as well as he knows that he is living to-day. The thing savors very much to my mind of the elements of a false pretense, and I am opposed to it and will endeavor to defeat it by any method in my power.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think when my honorable friends on the other side of the Chamber read what they have said this morning, after a little reflection they will regret that they have made their statements quite so positively. Senators have said they would resist the passage of this bill and the consideration of it in the way proposed. They have alleged that it is unfair, unreasonable, and without precedent. How can that be so when the President of the United States, in December last, said that we were in the face of a condition and not a theory; that the absolute wants of the Government demanded immediate consideration of the question of the reduction of the revenues? The House of Representatives at once proceeded to consider that question; and it took them seven months to incubate a measure before they could send it to us. It came to us near the end of last July, and the Senate, with unprecedented celerity (for it is not a rapid body, although a very conservative one), proceeded to investigate and examine and prepare and frame a bill, which has been submitted here as a counter-proposition. Both propositions were brought before us and considered here for a month or more. Then we adjourned over the Presidential election. And now, because the majority on this side of the Chamber, charged with the responsibilities of the duties of the Senate, propose in the ordinary way to expedite the consideration of this measure by the adoption of the very course that has been adopted for the consideration of any important measure in the last forty years at least, our proposition is denounced as revolutionary, extraordinary, without precedent, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. President, can not gentlemen remember six years ago, when on that side of the Chamber, by one of your most distinguished members, the very same proposition now made was made in order to expedite then pending business, among it the tariff act of 1883? The precise condition of things then existing has repeated itself. In December, 1882—the RECORD is before me—the House of Representatives sent us a proposition for an adjournment over the holidays. The Senate was then very much crowded with important business, among the rest the civil-service bill, the tariff bill then pending in the Committee on Finance, and the report of the Tariff Commission—very much the condition of affairs we have now. Thereupon Mr. Garland, rising in his place, proposed this amendment to the resolution of the House:

Mr. GARLAND. I move to strike out all after the words "the Senate concurring" and to insert:

That when the House of Representatives adjourns on Friday, the 22d instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, January 2, 1883, at 12 m.

That was, in other words, that the Senate proposed that the House of Representatives should, in accordance with its wish, adjourn at its own pleasure, but that the Senate would continue in session under the constitutional provision that it could only adjourn for three days at a time. That proposition was advocated by Mr. Garland and by Mr. Bayard and by other distinguished Senators on both sides of the Chamber, on the ground that the business of the Senate demanded the occupation of the holidays, that the constitutional limitation of the term of Congress to the 4th of March required of the Senate, in view of the pending business, that it should devote the time necessary immediately without respect to the holidays; and that proposition, although it failed, yet defeated the resolution for an adjournment over the holidays, and in fact the Senate did remain in session during the holidays and did debate and pass many important measures, and the Committee on Finance during that very time were in session considering the tariff bill, which was afterwards passed and became a law at that session of Congress.

Mr. President, that our proposition now made is not unusual and not unreasonable, it seems to me, must be plain to every gentleman who hears me. We have now in three months concentrated the business of the people of this country—65,000,000 people. Much business has come over from the last session of Congress, when the House was of one party and the Senate of the other, and therefore no concurrence has been had upon many important measures that ought to be acted upon one way or the other by the two Houses. Under the circumstances, when the same condition exists, the same overflowing revenue, the same necessity for the reduction of taxation, when all these difficulties surround us, is it unreasonable for us to propose to meet here at 11 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock, an order that is always made towards the conclusion of a session, and at the long session probably sixty days before it terminates? Is it unreasonable to place it in the power of a majority to have a recess and a night session? As a matter of course a motion to adjourn can be made at any time, and when a majority votes for it that adjourns the Senate without respect to this order, because that is a motion which is always in order.

Now, I will state to Senators in all candor that this is an effort on the part of the Republicans of the Senate, if you please, to expedite not only this business of the tariff, but the other business of the country, so that we may dispose of as many as possible of the questions in controversy, finish legislation partly formed, now imperfect, and not with a view of taking any advantage. We know that in the Senate of the United States it is absolutely impossible for either party to take advantage of the other. We are here like equal athletes, each able to stand and maintain his rights. We can do nothing without the practical consent of the Democrats. My friend from Iowa says we must act together, co-operate together, or neither can do anything in the present condition of the Senate. We can not expect to make much progress, and we can not expect to pass the tariff bill without your consent. We know it; we acknowledge it; but we ask you to remember what was said to you by the President of the United States as to the condition of our revenue; to read again his messages and his invocations and the appeals made in the House of Representatives. We ask you not to delay action upon this bill. Although we may not agree with you as to the particular form of relief, yet we are willing to present a measure, and this measure of ours can only be considered; it can not be acted on finally, because the House of Representatives, where you have a majority, must still pass upon the subject-matter, and without the consent of a large portion of the House of Representatives and a majority of the House this bill in either form, the House bill or the Senate bill, can not become a law of the land.

We propose to abandon our holidays and devote the time that has usually been granted by common usage to social festivities to important business of legislation. We say we will surrender those and come here with you at 11 o'clock every day and work such reasonable hours as a majority of the Senate may think proper to work, not only in the consideration of this bill, but in the consideration of other bills that are pressing and lying on our table. You say that is unreasonable, revolutionary, unconstitutional. I deny it. The majority in 1882–'83 did precisely the same thing. The Senate continued in session and worked during the holidays, adjourning only over Christmas and New Year's days, meeting again on the 2d of January, and proceeded rapidly to dispose of the public business. The result was that when the tariff bill of that session was reported within a week or two afterwards the decks were clear, the tariff bill was taken up, debated here, not upon the full information that we have now, but upon the report of the Tariff Commission and the testimony furnished by it, not near so voluminous or so important as the examinations made in the House and in the Senate during the present Congress. There never was in all my experience a bill that has been so carefully considered as the one now pending, including the Mills bill. The Mills bill was debated, considered for a long period of time elsewhere, and the Senate bill is but a proposition to amend it.

I say now in all frankness and in all earnestness if you Senators on the other side think there is any desire by this measure to take any advantage, to prevent you from a full consideration of this bill in all its parts, you are greatly mistaken. It is simply a proposition, caused, as I think, by a sense of public duty, that this question shall be presented as rapidly as possible, with no expectation or intention to take advantage of the absence of any one, to insist upon any unreasonable haste, but to proceed in an orderly way to dispose of the business of the Senate and get through with it as rapidly as we can.

In my judgment, after all the information we have had upon this subject, one or two weeks' debate upon the details of the tariff bill upon such amendments as Senators may desire to present would enable us to dispose of it and get it out of the way and send it back to the other House, where it will be in the hands of your friends, and as a matter of course no harm can be done except by the consent of the Democratic party. Then we shall go on and transact the other business of the session. But otherwise this tariff bill will "drag its slow length along" for days and weeks and months, because everybody admits the supreme importance of the measure. Thus the time will be consumed and other important interests of the people will be neglected. For one, without being excited about it, I wash my garments from all responsibility for any fault of that kind. While I expect to remain in the city at any rate during the holidays, and will not, therefore, make so many sacrifices as some Senators who desire to return to their homes, yet I say that we can afford during this short session to spend the holiday week in work, when we shall be probably less disturbed than at any other time, when, if you choose, the House of Representatives can go and take their holiday among their friends, no pending or striking measure being now before them. We can not do better service than to spend this short time in a frank, square, honorable consideration of the details of this bill, and present it to the House of Representatives for action after their meeting in January next.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, there is a classic saying that you should fear the Greeks when they bring gifts. I think the experience of the country fully justifies all wise men in suspecting a Republican and a protectionist who is in a hurry to reduce the revenue. That is what seems to be the matter on the other side just now. They want to reduce the revenue. They wanted to reduce it in 1883, if you will remember, Mr. President, and they railroaded that tariff bill through in 1883 in the way in which they propose to do this one, and they announced with a flourish of trumpets at the beginning of the discussion and all through its continuance that it would reduce duties at least 20 per cent., but when the bill went into effect and we began to collect customs under it, it was found that they had reduced it from 42 up to 47 per cent.! That is the situation now precisely.

The President of the United States was in a hurry, I am told. He did issue his message telling us that a condition and not a theory confronted us. He did tell us that the Treasury was overflowing, and that there was danger of a financial crisis being produced by the abstraction of so much money from the circulation of the country. But he told us at the same time that the people were suffering from unjust and undue taxation, and the whole statement was received with jeers on that side of the House. Now they have been converted to it. The President of the United States is not in any hurry now to increase those things which threaten the calamity that he deplored; he is not in a hurry for an increase of taxation upon the people; and although the bill of the Senators on that side would give some slight relief to the surplus that is in the Treasury, it would increase the amount of taxation which comes down upon the people on the necessaries of life, and that is one reason why we oppose this bill.

If it was a fair and equitable reduction of the duties and the taxation imposed upon the country, with anything like the equality or the justice which is displayed in the bill that came to us from the other House, so far as I am concerned you would find no opposition from me. But we do not want to increase the taxation which is complained of, and this bill notoriously and scandalously heaps the burden of taxation upon the commonest necessaries of life used by the humble. Therefore, while we do not desire, so far as I am concerned at least, for I am authorized to speak for no one else, to offer any kind of factious opposition to this bill, we want to examine it carefully and we want to have time to prepare and read the debates, so that if it contains the iniquities and inequalities that we think it does we may show them to the country, and that is all. We want it to go to the House of Representatives, if we can send it to the House, stripped of any of its inequalities or exposed in any of its unfairness. We desire that it shall go to the House of Representatives so that something may be done towards not only relieving the Treasury but towards relieving the people.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, in response to the suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], I desire to say a few words.

There is not the slightest disposition—I know on my own part and I am sure on the part of any Senator on this side—to unwarrantably interfere with the due process and progress of legislation on this or any other subject. There is no thought of that kind. However distasteful the provisions of this bill may be, it is entitled to its day in court and to its fair consideration, and shall have it so far as I am concerned. I respond to what the Senator from Ohio said in a spirit of amity and by a friendly desire to go forward with the work now in hand, but surely he will not pretend that the instances cited by him of former occasions are at all parallel with this.

Let us recall the circumstances by which this measure is surrounded. There came to this body from the House of Representatives an important and elaborate measure on the subject of Government revenue on the 24th of July last.

Mr. HARRIS. The 21st.

Mr. VOORHEES. The 21st, a little earlier than I had supposed. That measure was referred to the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member. It was taken charge of by the Republican members of that committee. I do not complain of that. I think it was a necessity growing out of party responsibility and the responsibility of majorities in legislative bodies. But, nevertheless, the fact is so. It went into their hands, and from that time until the 4th of October, or within a very few days thereof, I could no more find out what that majority were doing or what they intended to do, nor could any Senator on this side, than we could find what an ambushed enemy was doing who was waylaying the road. I was appealed to a hundred times, or perhaps a thousand times, by newspaper people to ascertain for them and let them know what the possibility of the action of the Finance Committee would be on this subject. There was not a page on this floor more ignorant or to whom it was more impossible to be intelligent on that subject than it was to me.

There for nine weeks the subject was closeted with you. I speak of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and the other honorable gentlemen who compose the majority of this committee. The subject was closeted with them thoroughly and absolutely, the door locked on it so far as we were concerned, time running on to an exciting and I may say a turbulent state of the public mind on the subject of the Presidential election. You had nine weeks on that side of the Chamber, in which we had not a day or an hour or a minute, for the consideration of this question. I repeat, you had nine weeks of this subject all to yourselves. I repeat it over again, to show you that there is no equality between us whatever, no justice in your demand that we shall go as fast as you do. You had nine weeks alone with this subject, while we had not an intimation, not a gleam of intelligence from your closeted room as to what you were doing or as to what you desired to do. It is well remembered that for weeks of that time it was not certain that you would do anything, that you would come to any agreement, that you would report any bill. I have heard the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] quoted a hundred times as saying that he did not know himself while they were in consultation on this great question.

Then, sir, the report was made on the 4th day of October. Ah! The Senator from Rhode Island thought he was felicitous in taking the Senator from North Carolina to task as to how his name came to be on the minority report on that day, if he did not understand the bill. I will tell that Senator how my name comes to be on that minority report. I had not read one word of the bill; I had had no opportunity to do so. I was to leave the city on the 6th day of October, to return no more during that session; and with that confidence which has never been abused or impaired, which I entertain for the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], I told him to sign my name to whatever his judgment approved, which he did. It was the only opportunity that I had to manifest my views, in that second-hand manner, if I may so express myself.

The Senator from Rhode Island says that on the 25th day of September each member of the committee was furnished with a copy of this bill. I am not here to dispute his word. I only say that I never saw a copy of the bill until I with great zeal and diligence on the very last day that I was here, on the 6th of October, hurried up or ran down two copies to send to a leading newspaper of the Mississippi Valley which had telegraphed to me for them. That was my first knowledge of the bill. Then for the next thirty days we were plunged into a discussion before the people. Thirty days after that was the Presidential election, and I say to the Senator—and I expect I am as well equipped as many or as a majority of the other Senators—that until the last ten days it has been impossible for me to read the bill or consider it. I have given it some consideration since then.

The evidence that has been taken here has been alluded to. I hazard nothing in saying that there are not twelve Senators on this floor who have read that testimony. I never saw it, for my part. There are not twelve Senators who could answer, upon an examination under oath, that they had ever read ten pages of it. And further than that, I doubt if there are twenty Senators who have read the bill; how many on this side or on the other side it is not worth while to inquire.

But I know this, and the country will know it, that a party, a committee having in charge this measure nine weeks to themselves have had an advantage over those who on this side could not have had thirty days before the Presidential election, and only have in fact had since this session of Congress convened. That is all the consideration that was possible to be given to it by us.

Ah, the Senator from Ohio asks us tenderly to remember the touching appeal of the President of the United States for a reduction of the surplus revenue. What memories some of us have! How brief the span! I remember the scoffing sneer of the Senator from Ohio at the President's able message wherein he depicted the evils of a surplus in the Treasury and of excessive taxation. Then there was no harm to flow from it at all, according to the Senator. Whenever the Senator goes and expurges that speech from the RECORD he may with propriety appeal to us. We have heeded the warnings of the Executive, we have done our duty, and we propose to continue to do our duty to the best of our ability.

I therefore, Mr. President, in behalf of fair play, not of delay, but for the purpose of having one-fourth as much opportunity to consider this bill as you have had on the other side, shall join in all that has been said or intended by the Senator from Tennessee. It is not because of the work, it is not because of the additional labor of meeting at 11 o'clock, or staying here at night or over the holidays, for I return to my duties here in good health and with as much vigor for hard work as any other member of this body; but if the Senators on that side suppose that they can, without any regard for fair play and equal rights on this bill, pass it, let them try. I think they will find that the old-fashioned way of doing by others as you desire to be done by will pay better.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I think it would be well for some of our friends on the other side to recall certain facts in history before they indulge in the language they have used here to-day.

We are met by two charges. One of them is that we have been guilty of great delay in this matter, and the other is that we are in too much of a hurry now. I recall to them the fact that next March fourteen years will have elapsed during twelve of which the Democracy has had possession of the House of Representatives, and yet on the 21st of July last they presented to us their first attempt to revise the tariff. During all these fourteen years the existing tariff has been an object of unceasing denunciation as an unequal, unjust, and oppressive form of taxation; and yet there never was sufficient ability, or harmony, or knowledge, whatever you may call it, there never was sufficient of power and unity in that body to even present us a bill.

This Administration came into power, and the Democracy found itself with a good working majority in one House and in possession of the Executive Departments. These old denunciations of the tariff were still in fashion. They were accentuated by the President's first message and by his message one year ago; and yet three years four months and eighteen days of that Administration passed away before they sent us a bill. Mark it! Three years four months and eighteen days of the existing national Administration passed away before the party was able to present to the Senate a bill, everybody being aware that the Senate can not originate a tariff bill. Since that bill came to the Senate——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to make one observation in connection with what he is saying?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I came into public life in Washington in 1869, twenty years ago next March. In every Congress ever since I have been in public life, when the Republicans have had control of the House of Representatives, there has been a revision of the tariff and a large reduction of public burdens. The first Congress of which I was a member so reduced the burdens that I made calculations that they had repealed internal-revenue taxes on the district which I represented alone amounting to $3,000,000 annually.

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill sent here by the House of Representatives was presented to the Senate and referred on the 21st of July. October 3, two months and thirteen days afterwards, the Finance Committee of the Senate reported it to the Senate—certainly a reasonable time. But the subcommittee of that Finance Committee, as is well known to the whole Senate, had been for months before preparing its revision. In two months and thirteen days the committee reported the bill. The printed testimony and the Senate revision of the tariff have been before us. Two months and sixteen days have elapsed since the bill was reported to the Senate—certainly time to have read the bill, certainly time to have looked at the schedules prepared by the Treasury Department comparing this with the existing tariff and the Mills bill.

Now there remain out of the twelve years during which the Democracy has had the power of originating a tariff bill two months and sixteen days—two months and sixteen days of the closing session of a Congress, with fourteen important appropriation bills to consider, and Senators on the other side grumble because we want to begin our sessions at 11 o'clock in the morning!

I submit these facts to the country as well as to the Democratic side of the Chamber. Remember also the figures I have here, that the so-called Mills bill was pending nobody knows how long, but certainly pending seven months and eighteen days, or about that, in the House of Representatives before it came here. And gentlemen talk about the closed sessions of the Finance Committee, about the bill having been considered in secrecy. It is not so, sir. The Senate committee, to my knowledge, was open all the while; the evidence was printed as rapidly as it could be in successive sections, and I got my scraps of it from time to time and got my bound volumes of it early. As I said, we have just two months and sixteen days remaining to pass fourteen appropriation bills and consider a tariff measure.

I call the attention of Senators to another consideration. We never shall have much more time in a Congress than this. Even when we had a Republican Congress in both Houses, which has happened but once in fourteen years—a House in which our friends were preparing the bill—it did not get to us here and our own committee was not able to report it and bring it before the Senate prior to the middle of January. Those who object to the Senate being in a hurry to discuss a tariff bill in a short session are practically objecting to any consideration of a tariff bill under any party whatever. You must always do it in this manner if you do it at all.

We are met on the one hand by charges of delay. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] the other day said we were desirous of keeping this question open for two years to come, and now we are charged with oppression in hurrying the consideration of this bill. Senators greatly mistake the Republican party and greatly mistake the manufacturing States when they think we desire to keep this an open question. To nobody is it more important that it should not be an open question than it is to us. There have been various enterprises for months, and I may say for years, in my own State awaiting some sort of conclusion, some probability of prophecy with regard to the tariff question, and I am happy to say that the reserved funds have been let loose in many cases since the election of Mr. Harrison—let loose not only for our blessing but for the blessing of large sections of the South, as Southern Senators well know.

Who, then, wants delay? Who desires to keep open these questions of doubt and vexation to our people? Not our capitalists, whose money is idle, who are unable to make any prophecies or calculations; not our working people—none of them. We are, and our action upon the record has shown it, in favor of prompt and decisive action. We have been every time since the war in favor of the reduction of duties and an addition to the free-list, and there have been no reductions of duties made since the war except those made by the Republican party. Every time it has touched the tariff it has largely increased the free-list and largely reduced the rates of taxation. And yet we are the people charged with desiring to keep the question open, a sore, agitating question on the one hand, and on the other hand we are charged with undue haste; but, as I say, it is impossible to act otherwise.

I call attention to the fact right here—not because you do not know it already, for it is in the report of the Finance Committee, but because it is neglected universally in the debate by the Democracy of the country—that there have been three important revisions of the tariff since 1870, all made by Republicans—the acts of July 14, 1870; of June 6, 1872, and of March 3, 1883.

By the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, one hundred and seventy-eight dutiable articles were placed on the free-list. These included many crude materials in use by our manufacturers imported from foreign countries, and not likely to be produced or manufactured here. The rates of duty were reduced upon fifty articles.

By the act of June 6, 1872, two hundred and thirteen items were added to the free-list, and duties were specifically reduced on forty-nine articles, in addition to a large number which had a 10 per cent. horizontal reduction.

Then we come to the act of March 3, 1883. I want to emphasize the fact, honorable to our party, that it was the only opportunity we have had in fourteen years to touch the tariff, and we had it, as I may say in common phrase, by the very skin of our teeth, having a majority in the two Houses to do it with, and yet we did it. We diligently worked at it, and when we were done, being driven as we are driven now by short time and by close majority, we went into national convention the next year and resolved that the work was not perfected, and called for a still further revision of the tariff.

Now again, for the first time when we have not been in power in the other House, our first chance under a Democratic House to revise it, we have revised it with all possible rapidity, and having only two months and sixteen days with a great mass of exceedingly important business, we are now making a sensible proposition to sit more hours a day, just as we did six years ago when we were in the same corner. I leave it to any fair jury which party has shown a zeal and desire to reduce the tariff, to reduce duties and to add to the free-list and to act promptly on a question of overwhelming importance.

By the act of March 3, 1883, of which I am proud, seventy-two additional articles were placed on the free-list while the rates were reduced on four hundred and twenty-seven paragraphs, embracing almost every schedule and almost every article on the dutiable-list.

Now, sir, by the command of the Democratic party, by the standard set up by Democratic orators, the Republican party has proved itself to deserve the confidence of the country in this matter.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say but a word, Mr. President. I do not intend during the pendency of this resolution to undertake a discussion of the Senate substitute for the tariff bill, nor is it my purpose to follow the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] through the tariff measures that have been adopted, as he says, under Republican auspices since 1870.

We all have a very vivid recollection of the tariff revision made by his party in 1883, when both Houses were Republican, with a Republican Executive to approve their conclusions, and the country has a very distinct recollection in the shape of a conviction that no relief ever came to any tax-payer upon the necessaries of life from that measure.

The Senator from Connecticut might have contented himself and certainly would have employed himself better in informing this Chamber and the country, if he had pointed out the relief that the pending tariff measure before this body is to bring to the tax-payers of this country.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is exactly what I desire to find out by a careful and deliberate and detailed discussion beginning at 11 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, Mr. President, and that brings me to the only practical suggestion I want to make to this Chamber, and that is, addressing the sense of fairness on the other side, to ask them if they believe we stand on even terms in the discussion of this bill. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said here the other day that he did not understand this bill and that it was not necessary that he should, because he relied with implicit faith upon the Republican membership of the Committee on Finance and accepted their conclusions, and it is given out, and it is believed by the country, and it is believed by this side of the Chamber, and I believe it, that the Republican majority in the Senate has already agreed in caucus to accept the formulated conclusions of its Finance Committee members and support this bill as a party.

Now, Mr. President, let us look and see the disadvantage that puts us at. I take it that there is not a Republican member on the opposite side of the Chamber who is any better posted or advised about the details of this bill than the average Democrat who sits over here, if he is not a member of the Finance Committee. Its members, of course, are posted; they are advised; they are better informed, for they made the measure. But the minority members of that Finance Committee are no better advised than we are, for, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has stated, and it has passed without contradiction, for nine weeks whilst the process of incubation was going on no Democratic Senator, even if he were a member of the Committee on Finance, had any better opportunity to advise himself than I or some one who did not belong to it.

Now, it is believed—and I have not yet heard it denied—that the resolution which is pending looking to a continuance of the session during the Christmas holidays is another product of the majority caucus, and that it is to be supported here to-day or whenever a vote shall be reached upon it by that side of the Chamber without a break in its vote—the result of caucus action. I beg those Senators to stop and answer to themselves and say whether this is fair treatment towards the minority of the Senate.

The Democratic members of the Finance Committee have already declared here upon this floor that they for lack of opportunity are not on even terms with the majority membership of that committee. They have no advantage and stand on no better ground in this fight than do the other Senators who do not belong to the committee at all. We are left, as every Senator here knows, without the aid of one of the most efficient, one of the best equipped of all the members on this Chamber floor on either side upon every question of tariff and taxation. My colleague [Mr. BECK], who stands at the head of the minority of that committee by service, is not here and can not be. That is an additional disadvantage in which we find ourselves.

I do not believe that our Republican friends were warranted in reaching any conclusion in caucus or elsewhere that we or anybody over here intended factious opposition to this bill, or to make dilatory motions, or employ unusual methods in order to protract its discussion and secure delay. I challenge the production of the record of this Chamber to show a single amendment that has been offered which does not upon its face carry proof conclusive that it was offered in good faith and debated in good faith and not for dilatory purposes.

There is no way for the minority of the Senate to prevent the passage of this resolution, for its passage has been determined upon by a caucus of the majority party—there is no way except it be by the employment of methods that I am glad to know are of unusual occurrence or appearance in this Chamber. But I do not wish to utter a warning. I simply desire to enter a protest against forcing upon the minority an issue fraught with as much importance and consequence to the whole American people as this, without the opportunities for consideration and debate being made equal and fair. That does not appear to have been done, and if it should come that any unusual method should be resorted to, of which I have no information and no right to speak, the majority side of this Chamber will have itself to blame for forcing and precipitating such an issue without having afforded ample opportunity and fair chance to the minority, who are otherwise powerless.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I might well have added to the reductions, of which I gave some statistics, this:

That if the rates of duty imposed by our tariff laws prior to the act of July 14, 1870, had been applied to the importations in 1887, the amount of duties collected in the latter year would have been $359,629,117.15, or an excess of $139,596,693.25 above the amount which was actually collected under the provisions of existing law.

One thing more. I omitted from that statement, which refers solely to customs duties, the internal taxes:

Of internal taxes the following have been the reduction made by the party now in the minority since the conclusion of the war:

By the acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,381,199
By the acts of March 31, 1868, and February 3, 1868	54,802,578
By the act of July 14, 1870	55,315,321
By the act of December 21, 1871	14,436,862
By the act of June 6, 1872	15,807,618
By the act of March 3, 1883	40,677,682
Total	284,421,260

An apparent reduction on the face of the bills by these acts touching internal taxes of $284,421,260. I say all the reductions have been made by the Republican party since the war in spite of the opposition of the Democracy.

A single statement more——

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will yield to me right there I should like to ask a question, unless it is an interruption.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly I will yield.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the reductions to which he refers were not largely or altogether—perhaps he has stated and I did not hear him—reductions in the internal-revenue system of taxation of the country?

Mr. HAWLEY. This last list I added for the reason that they were such reductions. I had previously stated the reductions in customs.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to ask the Senator further whether it is not a fact that during the large expenditure of the war period of the country, when internal-revenue taxes were laid upon every conceivable subject of consumption, there was not a corresponding increase of the tariff duties in order to compensate those who were engaged in domestic production; and also whether when these internal taxes were removed there was any corresponding removal of those increased duties which were laid on specifically for the purpose of meeting the increase of internal taxes?

Mr. HAWLEY. In some cases there were such reductions. Theoretically we always attempted to do it. But that is not the question under consideration now. The question is, who is anxious for prompt and thorough consideration and who has made reductions, whether wise or not? That is the question to which I am calling attention, and whether we are wise in asking to sit some extra hours in a day and meet a little earlier and omit some of our holidays in order to consider this important question. These are the points before us at this moment, not whether a proper balance between internal taxes and customs duties has been maintained in the reductions.

I call attention, if I may do so here—I think it is not a trespass on the etiquette prevailing between the two Houses—to the fact that in the consideration of what is known as the Mills bill the ruling majority in the other House did require that House, though it was the long session, to meet at 11, adjourn at 5, and sit also many evenings besides, when they had the whole summer before them; and now we have but two months and sixteen days left out of twelve years, before the adjournment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the allusions of Senators on the other side to the action of the Senate on the tariff act of 1883 are peculiarly unfortunate in view of the attitude which they now occupy. The tariff bill of 1883 was reported from the Finance Committee on the 4th day of January, 1883. It provided, as does this bill, for a general and thorough revision of the tariff and of all its schedules. We were then, as we are now, in the midst of a short session which was to close on the 4th day of March. Then, as now, this body was almost equally divided politically.

I say the report was made on the 4th day of January. On the 10th day of January that bill was taken up for discussion by the Senate and discussion was proceeded with by meeting at 11 o'clock and by night sessions until the bill finally passed the Senate. The Senate was given six days on both sides for an examination of the bill prior to the commencement of its discussion and consideration. Now seventy-eight days have elapsed since this bill was reported to the Senate for examination and consideration by the Senators upon both sides of the Chamber. If six days were sufficient in 1883, under exactly the same circumstances, how can you say that after seventy-eight days have elapsed there is any evidence of unfairness on this side of the Chamber if we ask you to proceed with diligence to the consideration and discussion of this bill?

Mr. VEST. I should like to correct the Senator. It was not six days. That bill of 1883 was made in six hours, made in a conference committee and by adopting provisions which had been voted down by a large majority in both Houses.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is entirely begging the question, with all respect to the Senator from Missouri. The bill was considered item by item for weeks and for months in this body, and it was considered by the Senate meeting at 11 o'clock and holding night sessions, its consideration commencing six days after the report of the committee.

I do not care at this time to go into a discussion of what was done by that conference committee further than to say that there were fewer changes made by that conference committee than in any other tariff bill that ever passed Congress, and fewer changes than are made in any appropriation bill that has passed Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. VEST. I do not care about going into that matter, but I refer to the public discussion of it between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If necessary I can bring that here and read it.

Mr. ALDRICH. And I will say to the Senator that I have denied the truth of the statements which were made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], and when he appears, which I hope will be very soon, I propose to substantiate that denial from the record.

Mr. VEST. I know nothing about the statements of the Senator from Kentucky. I know the statements made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Vermont, which were published and which I can produce here.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is entirely aside from the question now under consideration. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] says that he did not receive a copy of this bill on the 25th of September, at the time I said it was distributed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not make that statement, not impugning the Senator's remark at all, but I may say it is a fact nevertheless. It may have been my fault; I do not say it was the fault of the Finance Committee or the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that copies were delivered to every Democratic member of the committee who was then in the city on the 25th day of September.

Now let us see what there is about these circumstances which would indicate undue haste on our part, as alleged by the Senators on the other side. They say that we had sixty days to consider the bill, when they had no opportunity for its consideration or for the consideration of this question. The Democratic members of the subcommittee had every opportunity which the Republican members had. There was not one hearing in the whole sixty days that was not open to every member, to each one of the minority members of that subcommittee. Nothing was concealed from any member of the committee. Our hearings and discussions were always open, not only open to members of the subcommittee but to members of the full committee. Of course the draught of the bill was made by the Republican members. It could not have been made otherwise. And if because they had sixty days, you say, in advance of the time that you had, and for that reason you can not consider the bill now, when will you ever be able to consider it, if that is a reason?

I submit to gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that every single amendment which has been offered to this bill so far has been in identical terms with provisions of the House bill. That bill was reported to the House of Representatives last April, months ago, and it is fair to assume that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber were familiar with its provisions. They were familiar with the reasons which led the Committee on Ways and Means of the House to adopt those provisions. They were familiar with the discussion in the House of Representatives on the various items; and they are familiar with the reasons which led to their adoption. If they propose to continue as they have in the past, simply to offer such amendments as have been indicated by the action of the House of Representatives, what further preparation is needed? That bill and the Senate bill, I venture to say, were discussed upon the hustings by every Senator on that side of the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Senator from Rhode Island will suspend his remarks. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the consideration of the resolution will go on until the vote is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business having been laid before the Senate——

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of the pending resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to proceed to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure there will be no objection to the Senator from Rhode Island finishing his remarks.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not object to the Senator continuing his remarks. The unfinished business may be laid aside for that purpose. I of course do not wish to cut the Senator off from completing his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized by the Chair to complete his remarks at this time, no objection being made.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was on the point of saying that the provisions of the House bill as well as the provisions of the Senate bill and the general question at issue between the two parties were discussed by every Democratic Senator, I venture to say, upon the stump during the last campaign. Did any one of those Senators undertake to say to his constituency that he did not understand the questions involved, that he had no opportunity for learning what the provisions of the House bill were after it had been adopted by the St. Louis convention and made the issue in the campaign? Did any of them make the confession then which is now made, that they did not understand the question, that they did not know what the Mills bill contained, and did not know what the Senate bill contained? No, sir.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] charged the majority of the Committee on Finance with undue delay before the election. They were anxious then for some action upon this tariff question. The revenue must be reduced and the tariff must be reduced. It was the one living issue before the American people. What has happened since that this great change should take place in the views of the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber? Why do they come here now and say they do not know anything about the question and ask us to delay indefinitely action upon it? If the country is suffering from a tariff which is unjust, why not try to enact one which will work justice?

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the Senator from Rhode Island mean to say that we are asking him to delay indefinitely the consideration of this bill? That was his language.

Mr. ALDRICH. Practically.

Mr. VOORHEES. We do not ask any such thing, and the Senator certainly knows it. We ask no indefinite delay. It has been repeated over and over again in that Senator's hearing that all we ask is the usual process and progress of legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. In terms the Senators upon that side do not ask for indefinite delay, but when in the consideration of this bill, with a limited number of days remaining for its disposition, but one single paragraph is disposed of in a day, and when they vote for adjournment from Thursday to Monday every week and for the earliest adjournment every day, and when they refuse to consider a proposition to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning and have night sessions, a precedent which has been followed in every Congress where important legislation of this kind has been pending, their acts speak louder than any words of theirs in this Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the resolution in regard to the sessions of the Senate, the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will ask that the resolution be read, as I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As proposed to be modified?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; the substitute that has been offered modifying the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution as proposed to be modified will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday, December 19, and until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out all that part after the words "11 o'clock in the forenoon."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to read:

That on and after Wednesday, December 19, until otherwise ordered, the hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The CHIEF CLERK. Striking out the words:

And that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very much astonished at the language of some of our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber in regard to reasonable and proper requests upon this side. The Senator from Ohio said that we had denounced this resolution as unconstitutional and revolutionary. I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Ohio did not want to make upon the floor of the Senate false and unfounded and groundless statements, and yet I challenge him to show what Senator upon this side has denounced this resolution as unconstitutional.

The Senator from Rhode Island charges that we are attempting to defeat any action upon the tariff bill. Mr. President, I say that charge is unqualifiedly untrue, and all insinuations to that effect are without any foundation in fact. Let us look at this matter just as it is. It has been charged that the House of Representatives had the House bill under consideration for over seven months, and that that bill was passed on the 21st of July last and that the Senate committee reported it on the 3d of October. What are the facts? The House passed the bill on the 21st of July; on the 21st of July it was received in the Senate. The Senate Finance Committee reported it back to the Senate on the 3d of October. How long was that? That was seventy-four days.

But let us go back to the record of the Senate Finance Committee and see what they have been doing. I am not sure as to the date—it has been stated, but I have not been able to lay my hands upon it—but in May some time (perhaps the Senator from Tennessee can tell me) the Senate Finance Committee appointed a subcommittee to consider the tariff question.

Mr. HARRIS. It was some time in May, but I do not remember the particular day in May. I have not looked at the record recently.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say in May last—I have not the precise date although I have had it—the Senate Finance Committee appointed a subcommittee to consider the tariff question.

Mr. ALLISON. The 25th of May.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 25th of May, then, the Senator from Iowa informs me, that subcommittee was appointed. On the 26th day of May, 1888, that subcommittee met. "Present, Messrs. ALLISON, chairman, JONES, HISCOCK, VOORHEES, BECK, and HARRIS." I suppose they with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] constitute the members of the subcommittee. The name of the Senator from Rhode Island is not down at the first meeting. Then Senators "ALLISON, ALDRICH, JONES, HISCOCK, VOORHEES, BECK, and HARRIS" constitute the subcommittee that commenced the consideration of the tariff question.

The bill was then pending in the other House, and was being discussed, and those Senators knew just as well as they know now that they intended to report a substitute for that bill if it ever passed the other House. They were preparing the substitute; they were taking testimony, and they had the Senate substitute under consideration, therefore, from the 25th day of May to the 3d day of October, one hundred and thirty days. For four and a third months the Senate Finance Committee devoted themselves to the preparation of this substitute. They took testimony, which was printed in leaflet for the use and benefit of the committee, and was not furnished to Senators, at least not to Senators on this side of the Chamber. It is not usual, I believe, in such cases that the testimony should be furnished to all Senators. I am not complaining of that, but I am only stating the fact in the case.

They reported their bill to the full committee on the 25th day of September. Much stress has been placed upon that, but I desire to say that my information is that when the bill was reported to the full committee of the Senate on the 25th day of September last there was an absolute injunction upon the members of that committee that they should not give out the bill to anybody else but to the members. I understand the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], who is now absent, desired a copy of the bill, and the Senate Finance Committee requested, or required, that that copy of the bill should be sent to him by a special messenger. The minority members of the Finance Committee were not considered free to show the bill to their brother Democratic Senators until the final action of the committee upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. What the Senator says is substantially true, that when the bill was reported to the full committee, by the unanimous consent or agreement of that committee, and especially the Democratic members, it was deemed wise not to make the bill public until the reports could accompany the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And I may add, Mr. President, if my friend will allow me, that I in my innocence having applied to the committee having charge of the bill for a copy of it did not get it, just like the Democratic gentlemen.

Mr. ALLISON. I remember very well that the Senator from Vermont wanted to look at it, but was not at liberty under the unanimous-consent rule to procure a copy.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was the request of the Democratic members.

Mr. ALLISON. It was the request of the members on the Democratic side that the bill should not be made public until the reports accompanied it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am only stating a fact. I am not a member of the committee, and, as a matter of course, do not know at whose instance it was done, but I thought it remarkably strange that so much secrecy should be observed in sending a copy of the bill to the senior Senator from Kentucky that it could not be intrusted to the mail and had to be sent by a special messenger. I thought it very strange at the time and commented upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator goes into detail respecting that which was the wish of the minority of the committee, that at the earliest possible moment the Senator from Kentucky, who was at Fortress Monroe, should have a copy of the bill, and it was deemed important by us all that that copy should be sent by a special messenger rather than to trust it to the slow processes of the mails. We did not know when it would reach him if it passed through the mails.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill was reported to the Senate on the 3d day of October last. There was not a quorum of the Senate present at that time. There was not a quorum of the Senate present at any time from that date to the day of adjournment. There was some hurried discussion upon the bill. There were efforts made to prepare tables showing exactly the effect of the proposed changes in the substitute, and to institute a fair and just comparison between the House bill and the Senate bill; but those tables were not prepared before the Senate adjourned. The tables prepared by the Senate Finance Committee were furnished to us before Congress adjourned, but the tables which were prepared in the Treasury Department and the tables which were prepared by the House committee were not received prior to the adjournment.

I have tried to ascertain when the testimony was printed. I have telephoned to the Public Printer to ascertain the day when he sent up the second and third volumes of the testimony before the Finance Committee. I sent to the Senate document-room to ascertain the dates when they were received there, and our superintendent replies as follows:

We keep no record of the time documents are received from the Printer. If my memory serves me correctly, the testimony of the Finance Committee was received four or five days before the adjournment.

Respectfully, yours,

AMZI SMITH.

I do not think my memory fails me when I say that I never saw more than one volume of that testimony before Congress adjourned in October last. I obtained one volume of the testimony, I can not say exactly how many days, but only a few days, probably two or three days, before we adjourned. I do not remember the exact date, but it was only a short time before the final adjournment. I know it did not give me time even to open it or attempt to read it. The second volume I never saw until my return here after the election.

Now the proposition is to meet at 11 o'clock and remain in session until half after 5, six and a half hours, and then meet at 8 and sit indefinitely. I have no objection in the world to meeting at 11 o'clock, and no objection has been made upon this side of the Chamber to meeting at 11 o'clock. But I do not think it is right, I do not think it is fair just now, that we shall commence night sessions.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think there is much necessity for further argument on the part of the Senator from Missouri if he is willing to meet at 11 o'clock, because when it comes to 5.30 o'clock if a motion is made to adjourn and a majority of the Senate want to adjourn, we shall adjourn. The Senator knows how easy it is to obtain a majority for adjournment at that hour on any day.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all very true, but the Senator from Vermont will bear me out in saying that when we have passed a rule of the Senate Senators obey it and do not undertake to take advantage of it. If we were to pass this rule we should not feel at liberty to trample it under our feet and disregard it.

Let us meet at 11 o'clock and go on for a few days and see what progress we make. We can then determine in a few days as to the length of recess we shall take, whether it will be one, two, or three days, or whatever may be the time. We shall then know exactly the time that is before us, and if night sessions become necessary within a reasonable time there will be no factious opposition offered to them from this side of the Chamber. We never have offered any factious opposition to the consideration of just and fair measures in a just, fair, and proper manner; but I for one do not propose to submit to having the Senator from Ohio denounce the action of the Democratic members of the Senate and say that they have stated (I repeat it now because he is present) that this resolution was revolutionary and unconstitutional. I say that Democratic Senators have never asserted any such proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I ever asserted it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator used that exact language.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator will see that I did not. I shall not look over the Reporter's notes of my remarks, but I think the Senator will find himself mistaken.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator used the language, for I took note of it at the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never in that connection denounced the opposition of the Democratic party as unconstitutional or revolutionary. I think the Senator will find my language recorded differently.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know positively that the Senator said it. He may not have intended to use the language, but I thought it very strange, speaking as guardedly as he generally does, that he should use both those words.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think I did. I certainly never intended to denounce the action of the Democrats in that particular as revolutionary or unconstitutional, because it is neither. I think it is very unreasonable.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, the Senator does not catch the point. He did not denounce our course as unconstitutional and revolutionary, but he stated that we had said that the resolution proposing to meet at 11 o'clock and take a recess at half after 5 and meet at 8 was revolutionary and unconstitutional. I say no Democratic Senator ever made any such statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the declaration made by the Senator's colleague was very nearly that; but if I am mistaken about it, I wish to be corrected.

Mr. VEST. I never said any such thing. The notes of the Reporter will show that I did not use such language.

Mr. COCKRELL. The idea of a Democratic Senator stating that a resolution about adjournment was unconstitutional! It was farcical, and I was astonished to hear the Senator making such a statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. Instead of that I will simply say that the resolution is, I think, in almost the same words and very much in the same form as the resolution under which the original bill was acted upon and passed in the House of Representatives. The Mills bill was considered under a resolution almost in terms like the one pending; that is, that the House would meet at 11 o'clock and take a recess at a certain hour. Under such a resolution the Mills bill was considered, and I never denounced that course as revolutionary or unconstitutional, for I do not think it is so. I think it is the perfect right of a minority at any time to resort to any reasonable degree of delay and tactics for delay. That is perfectly constitutional, and it is not revolutionary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I say I was very much astonished to find that the Senator would state that we had made such a charge as that, and I am certain he made it because my attention was specially attracted to it at the time.

Now, let us meet at 11 o'clock. There will be no opposition to that. We have made no opposition to the length of the daily sessions. Only once did we ask for an adjournment before the Senator from Iowa was ready to adjourn. We did not ask to adjourn then, but we asked to have an executive session when there was important executive business to be transacted. The Senator objected to it then, and at 5 o'clock we went into executive session. He knows perfectly well that we have conferred with him ever since that time in regard to having an executive session or an adjournment, as we did yesterday evening.

Let us go on until 5 o'clock. Nobody objects to sitting until that hour; but I do not think the time has come when we ought to be asked to come back here at a night session. I believe it may be avoided entirely until towards the close of the session. Senators know perfectly well that night sessions are not prolific of expediting business. They are not the best sessions that the Senate holds for the transaction of business; they are not the most pleasant sessions; and I believe we can get along with the bill and pass it without any night sessions. If a night session becomes necessary in order to get a fair and full discussion of the bill and a fair disposition of it, I shall not oppose a night session. I have never opposed night sessions when I thought they would accomplish any good.

I say to Senators upon the opposite side that a night session now will do them no good; it will be a harm to them; it will impede rather than facilitate or hasten the disposition of the bill. I trust, therefore, that my amendment will prevail. I do not propose to go into the discussion of the merits of this controversy or to meet the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who stated what the Republican party had done in the way of reducing the tariff.

Mr. President, the record speaks for itself. The Republican party have made reductions of taxes, but they have been reductions of the internal revenue; they have not been reductions of the tariff taxes. The internal-revenue receipts in 1866 were $309,000,000, and they have reduced them to $124,000,000 in 1888.

Mr. VEST. If my colleague will permit me, the Reporter has furnished me with what I did say. I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio to it. Here is what I said:

On account of the sickness of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] work has been devolved upon some of us on this side of the Chamber which has been most irksome, but it had to be performed; and now for this Senate to change its rule, meet at 11 o'clock, then again at 8, and expect us to do justice to this question, to the details of the bill, is simply cruel and outrageous, and I use the terms with their full significance.

I never used the words "revolutionary" or "unconstitutional."

Mr. COCKRELL. The tariff taxes in 1866 amounted to $179,000,000. In 1888 they amounted to $219,000,000. There is the record; it speaks for itself. The internal-revenue taxes were increased at various times, and with every increase of the internal-revenue taxes there came an increase of the tariff taxes. There was an express promise made that when the internal-revenue taxes were reduced the tariff taxes should be reduced in proportion, and that promise has never been fulfilled to this day. The internal-revenue taxes have been reduced, and the tariff taxes that were imposed for the simple reason only of the imposition of the internal-revenue taxes never have been repealed, they never have been reduced, they never have been modified.

Mr. President, I could cite here testimony from the Senator from Vermont who sits farthest from me [Mr. MORRILL] and from the Senator from Iowa who sits nearest me [Mr. ALLISON] and others, from the debates, showing that when the internal-revenue taxes were imposed and the tariff taxes were increased in consequence of them there was a distinct understanding that when the internal-revenue taxes were taken off the tariff tax which had been imposed because of the imposition of the internal-revenue taxes should also be reduced. I say that promise has never been redeemed. That promise has never been kept. The Republican party have reduced taxation. They have removed the internal-revenue taxes from apothecaries and from auctioneers, from banks and from bankers, from billiard-rooms and from bowling-alleys, from pawn-brokers and from produce-brokers and stock-brokers, from circuses, claim agents, express carriers, and insurance agents. Even jugglers and lottery-ticket dealers have been relieved of the internal-revenue taxes imposed upon them. In addition thereto, all the manufacturers, patent-right dealers, peddlers, and theaters have had internal-revenue taxes removed. But there has been no removal of the tariff taxes to correspond with this reduction of the internal-revenue taxes.

I only desired to say this much in regard to the matter, and I hope the amendment which I have offered, which will simply leave the Senate to meet at 11 o'clock, will be adopted.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, before the resolution passes by I wish to make a single remark.

The Senator from Ohio stated, quoting the Senator from Iowa, that that side of the Chamber fully recognizes the fact that neither this bill nor any other legislation of the kind can pass without the assistance or the consent of the Democratic portion of the Chamber. If that be so, it seems to me that common fairness, not to say courtesy, ought to have suggested that this side of the Chamber should have been consulted in regard to the matter before this resolution was attempted to be hurried through here in the manner that has been attempted.

I say now, speaking for myself, for I am not authorized to speak for any one else, if that statement of the Senator from Ohio be met in its full and complete sense, then this side of the Chamber (speaking for myself, of course) is perfectly ready to meet the majority and adjust this matter to the satisfaction of both parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment and the amendment proposed to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. MORRILL is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That on and after Wednesday, December 19, and until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.

The amendment of Mr. COCKRELL to the amendment is to strike out the words—

And that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m.—

So as to read:

That on and after Wednesday, December 19, and until otherwise ordered, the daily hour of meeting of the Senate shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. Is this considered a party question? I do not see the Senator's colleague present, and I will withhold my vote.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], but I have transferred my pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr HAMPTON], and I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON's name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], who is absent from the city.

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired by general arrangement with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and as the question seems to take the shape of party division I must withhold my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. ALLISON. I was paired, as I supposed, with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], but I understand that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is paired with him. So I shall vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Berry,	Daniel,	Pasco,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Payne,	Voorhees,
Blodgett,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Gorman,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Reagan,
Coke,	Harris,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Chace,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Chandler,	Frye,	Morrill,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Paddock,	Stockbridge.
Davis,	Hiscock,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Platt,

ABSENT—24.

Beck,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Blair,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Spooner,
Bowen,	George,	McPherson,	Stanford,
Brown,	Hale,	Morgan,	Teller,
Butler,	Hampton,	Plumb,	Vest,
Cameron,	Hearst,	Quay,	Walthall.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I desire to say that I understand that there is a fair expectation that we can come to a mutual agreement on both sides of the Chamber in half an hour——

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator from Vermont proceeds—I have not heard what his request of me was—I desire to offer a substitute for the resolution, upon which the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, I suppose, would be in order.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator did not apprehend——

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will excuse me, for I am very sure he will find that his remarks will be more pertinent after I get through than they are now.

It has been repeatedly declared by Senators on this side of the Chamber, who, while disclaiming any authority to speak for their fellows, yet are as much authorized to speak for them as any Senator here, that there is no desire or wish or purpose entertained by Senators on this side to obstruct the passage of the Senate substitute for the House bill. On the contrary, I think there is a general consensus on this side that it would be well for the action, whatever it is to be on the part of the Senate, to be taken at as early a day as is consistent with the rights of individual members to scrutinize the provisions of the bill and to suggest what may appear to them to be proper amendments thereto.

On my own part I entirely sympathize with the feeling which I have just stated as to the belief entertained on this side, and I hope that there will be no unnecessary delay in coming to final action upon the substitute proposed by the Finance Committee to the House bill. As that feeling and that purpose we thought had been made manifest on this side, it was with some surprise and something of a feeling of grievance that the resolution providing for the meeting of the Senate at 11 o'clock and for night sessions, and with the declared purpose that there should not be the usual Christmas vacation, was heard by Senators on this side of the Chamber.

The tariff measure now before the Senate is one of transcendent importance to the people of this country. Differing views are entertained by the two sides of this Chamber upon its policy, upon its general scheme, and upon the details of the measure. With entire respect for the opinions of those who differ with me, I think I am voicing the general sentiment of this side when I say that we only desire to make expression of our points of difference in an intelligible manner and in such a way that we shall not unnecessarily consume the time of the Senate in beating the air in a discussion which shall be founded upon insufficient consideration and insufficient preparation.

The plan proposed by the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont, as was said by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] awhile ago, puts us at a very great disadvantage in performing merely our duty in regard to the bill. We are differently situated from Senators on the other side in that respect. They have determined, and may well determine, to follow the lead of the very able members of the Finance Committee who represent them in that committee. They have proposed a bill which, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said some days ago, though he did not understand it in all its details, yet Senators on that side had determined to follow the lead of the very able gentlemen who had prepared the bill, because they believed in its general scheme and its general purposes.

On this side we are very differently situated. We do not believe in the general scheme or the general purposes of that bill, and we are not prepared to follow the lead of the Senators who have given their nights and days for long months to the preparation of the scheme. In order to express the points of difference we need time on this side that is not needed on the other; but it is only a fair time, it is only a reasonable opportunity that we ask.

Therefore, with a view of testing the sense of fairness of Senators on the other side, in order that we may reasonably co-operate in expediting the public business, I offer as a substitute for the resolution what I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That until otherwise ordered the daily hour of meeting of the Senate during this week shall be 11 o'clock in the forenoon, and that at 5.30 o'clock in the afternoon a recess shall be taken until 8 o'clock p. m., with a view of utilizing the time of the Senate so as not to interfere with the usual holiday vacation as proposed by the joint House resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. With a view of coming to a compromise with the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, as I understand there is a fair prospect of such a compromise being made, I ask for the postponement of the resolution until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of the resolution and the amendments be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware objects.

Mr. VEST and others (to Mr. GRAY). Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. GRAY. In deference to the wishes of Senators around me, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the further consideration of the resolution and the amendments is postponed until to-morrow. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back with an amendment the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the adjournment of the two Houses for the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the concurrent resolution by striking out, in lines 2 and 3, the words "two Houses adjourn" and inserting the words "House of Representatives adjourns;" and in line 4, by striking out the word "they" and inserting the word "it;" so as to read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the House of Representatives adjourns on Friday, December 21, 1888, it stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that this resolution also go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the report, if there be no objection, will be postponed until to-morrow. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RED RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. VEST. I ask leave to report two bills from the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3666) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across the Red River," approved May 21, 1888, to report it with an amendment. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill. It simply amends an act already passed by Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill just reported from the Committee on Commerce may be now considered.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall feel constrained to object if it takes any time.

Mr. VEST. It will take no time that I know of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 3 of the act approved May 21, 1888, by inserting, after the words "under this act," in line 1, the words "below the mouth of the Red Lake River;" and further, after the words "said bridge," in line 11, by inserting "and any bridge built under this act, above the mouth of the Red Lake River, shall be built with one draw-span of not less than 87 feet in the clear, measured at low water, and this draw-span shall be over the main channel at the most accessible and best navigable point, and the other span may be less than 80 feet and be kept clear of trestle-work;" also by inserting, in line 13, after "parallel to," the words "and except above the mouth of the Red Lake River;" and also by inserting, in line 15, after the word "stream," as follows: "and above the mouth of the Red Lake River the bridge may be placed at an angle of 83° with the direction of the current of the stream."

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was, in line 16, after the word "work," to insert:

And the plan shall not be of less elevation than 3 feet above extreme high-water mark as shown at the point of location, measured to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

YOUNG'S BAY BRIDGE.

Mr. VEST. I am also instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3645) granting to the Astoria and South Coast Railway Company the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in the county of Clatsop and State of Oregon, to report it without amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if there is any objection to the present consideration of the bill? Does the Senator from Missouri desire the bill to go upon the Calendar?

Mr. VEST. Not at all.

Mr. DOLPH. Is there any objection, if the Senate indulges me, to have it considered now?

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest objection. I did not see the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] in his seat.

Mr. DOLPH. There is a pressing necessity for the bill, and I ask that it be considered now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. CHACE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, submitted a report to accompany the adverse report made yesterday on the resolution in relation to amounts due postmasters for services rendered the United States between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 3736) to increase the pension of Julia A. Ross; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (S. 3737) for the relief of Sterling H. Tucker and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FARWELL introduced a bill (S. 3738) for the reorganization and increased efficiency of the personnel of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3739) to increase the pension of Mrs. Fanny A. Boyd, widow of Capt. O. B. Boyd; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SUNDAY-REST BILL.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask an order of the Senate to reprint the bill (S. 2983) to secure to the people the enjoyment of the first day of the week, commonly known as the Lord's day, as a day of rest, and to promote its observance as a day of religious worship. The copies heretofore printed have been exhausted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment of the Committee on Finance will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

150. Wire rods.—Rivet, screw, nail, fence, and other iron or steel wire rods, whether round, oval, flat, or square, in coils or loops, or in any other shape, not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound; and iron or steel flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound: Provided, That all iron or steel rods, whether rolled or drawn, smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, shall be classed and dutiable as wire.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I was under the impression that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] asked that that paragraph be passed over before leaving the Senate yesterday. I am not sure, however, about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing to indicate such action on the files.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Then I presume I was mistaken.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from New Jersey simply desired to have the opportunity of moving an amendment at a later stage, and the Chair in response said that the paragraph would be open to him for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state that by understanding and agreement of the Senate any paragraph in the bill can be reverted to for the purpose of amendment after the reading of the bill has been concluded.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it would be in order to move to amend paragraph 150.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment to the paragraph would be in order.

Mr. TURPIE. Then in line 568 I move to strike out the words "six-tenths of one cent," and insert in lieu thereof the words "six mills;" and in line 570, to strike out the words "six-tenths of one cent," and insert in lieu thereof the words "six mills;" so as to read:

150. Wire rods.—Rivet, screw, nail, fence, and other iron or steel wire rods, whether round, oval, flat or square, in coils or loops or in any other shape, not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, six mills per pound; and iron or steel flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, six mills per pound: Provided, That all iron or steel rods, whether rolled or drawn, smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, shall be classed and dutiable as wire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. VANCE. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I ask whether this paragraph by unanimous consent was not left open for the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the paragraphs, the Chair will state, are left open.

Mr. VANCE. This paragraph was specially left open, I thought, for the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the RECORD examined and ascertain as to that. There is nothing to indicate such action on the files. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, if I understand the progress we have made in the tariff debate, paragraph 150 is a part of what is called an amendment to the original bill. It is part of the amendment offered as a substitute for the original bill; and of the original bill itself there is nothing left in the report of the committee except the enacting clause and the title.

The title is a very significant one: "To reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." There are two purposes expressed in this title. Certain Senators are of opinion that the first purpose as expressed has been very much impaired by the action of the committee and the subcommittee. I am of the opinion that the second purpose expressed has been lost sight of altogether by the majority who reported the substitute. It certainly was accounted as of equal importance with the first.

The language of the substitute is that of illusion and deception, not by design, but from the utter want of any care or attention to it. Take the expression "six-tenths of one cent" occurring twice in the pending paragraph, and in paragraph 144 the expressions are "one and one-tenth cents," "one and two-tenths cents," "one and four-tenths cents," "one and five-tenths cents" successively. The whole substitute is full of terms and phraseology of that character.

What is the meaning of six-tenths of a cent? A tenth of a cent means a mill, and a mill may be defined as the tenth of a cent or the thousandth part of a dollar. I do not know that it adds anything to the perspicuity of a statute to put in the definition of a word instead of the word itself. When "six-tenths of a cent," which constitutes the definition of six mills, is meant in a bill, why is it not preferable to say six mills? In the instance we had under consideration the other day, with respect to structural iron, there was this very awkward phraseology: "One cent and one-tenth of a cent," "one cent and one-sixteenth of a cent," with various others.

I might ask the learned and honorable chairman of the subcommittee whether he has made a complete study of the subject of lingual concealment or verbal ambush? I presume he has not, and that there has been no study on the subject at all. Else why was a pound selected as a unit for taxation instead of an ounce? For if the paragraph had provided one-sixteenth of a cent and one-tenth of one-sixteenth of a cent per ounce, the meaning would have been the same and the mystery would have been much greater.

Of course it may be asked, who would want to use one ounce of structural iron? I ask, who would want to use one pound of structural iron? And it may be asked again, why is not the ton in the case of structural iron made the unit of assessment with respect to the tariff? It is $20 a ton. Everybody understands that, and the most ordinary beam and girder does not consist of a less weight.

Why is it not based upon the ton as a unit? Is there any desire to hide the amount of the exaction? Not at all, sir; it is simply the want of carefulness and the inattention to what we may consider the plainest terms of English or the vernacular of the United States.

What is the use of all this dismal array of decimals and fractions? The amendment ought to be made in every section and paragraph of the substitute precisely as it is offered here. The most casual reader would then come to the correct conclusion as to the amount of tax assessed by the bill.

I speak of these words as things because in this connection they are things, and they have the appearance of belonging to the "hidden things of dishonesty." They are very far removed from that simplicity which according to the title of the bill ought to characterize its text.

It is sometimes almost as curious to note the wilderness of unmeaning phraseology in a measure as some of the reasons assigned for its passage. I understood the Senator from Nevada farthest from the Chair [Mr. STEWART] and the Senator from Massachusetts nearest me [Mr. DAWES] both to have taken the position here that taxes assessed by our tariff legislation were paid by foreigners, and it was stated by them with great complacency that they were perfectly willing that foreigners should pay our tariff taxes, and it was stated with great earnestness that no man anywhere should object to such payment by foreigners.

The bill is entitled "A bill to reduce taxation," and I thought the phrase "to reduce taxation" alluded to the taxes of our own people. If it alludes to tariff taxes paid by foreigners, as is here claimed, it furnishes me only an additional reason for being opposed to the substitute. I am not myself in favor of reducing the taxes of foreigners or the amount of taxes paid by foreigners. I would rather increase the amount, if any such are to be so paid.

It seems, from the remarks of these Senators, that the prohibitory tariff trust is about inaugurating a period of commercial millennium; that the divine apostolic injunction, "Bear ye one another's burdens," is to become not only a rule of private conduct but a maxim of international law and usage.

The only possible defect in such a policy would be that while sometimes a balance of trade is largely in our favor, as the foreigners pay the taxes under our tariff legislation, we must then pay the taxes on exports under theirs; and we would then necessarily pay a larger share of the tariff taxes of foreigners than the foreigners pay of ours.

What a very strange sort of fiscal reciprocity, what a very strange view of international economics, this presents! I think those Senators upon this side as well as a majority of sane people, healthful and wholesome-minded people on the subject of Federal taxation, still retain the notion that taxes imposed by an act of Congress of the United States are paid by the inhabitants of the United States, and that they are as local to the people of this country as taxes for sewerage or gas imposed by the municipal authorities of New York on the inhabitants of that city.

The honorable Senator from Iowa opened this debate with a protestation of very unusual vehemence in relation to the good faith with which this measure was proposed, stating that it was not a partisan measure nor offered with a view to benefit any party, and that the subcommittee and the committee had no other motives in it than those of subserving the best interests of the Republic. The same disclaimer was aided by a similar declaration of the very able and accomplished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the principal coadjutor of the chairman of the subcommittee in this relentless raid of monopolies against the people.

Upon this side we are disposed to give full credence to those disclaimers, and to give as full credence without the disclaimer as with it. What was the reason of this earnest and gratuitous protestation in advance by the committee in relation to their purposes and objects in the introduction of this substitute? Had they conceived that there would be anything of reproof from this side of the Chamber for the policy contained in the bill?

The committee and the subcommittee may be deserving of much reproof, but they are also deserving yet more of sympathy. The majority of the committee and subcommittee and their coadjutor have yielded to an irresistible and uncontrollable influence, the influence of a superstition—a superstition springing from the creed taught now for so many years in that school of political economy so richly endowed by the incorporators of the prohibitory-tariff trust, instructed in the maxim that all mankind, all the labor, and all the capital in the country must be taxed for the benefit of a few non-laboring and non-producing classes.

I suppose this superstition, like others of the same character, must have its course. I suppose it will have its day, like the South Sea craze in England, the tulip mania in Holland, or the Darien speculation of John Law in France. It will have its day, and it will bring disaster even to those interests which it pretends to foster.

Again it is said—and I have heard that also with extreme surprise—that no amendment should be offered from this side of the Chamber; that every such amendment was a request for a special privilege; that whether the amendment provided that hoop-iron for the hay-maker and the cotton-raiser should be put upon the free-list or the enormous tax imposed by this measure simply reduced, in either event the exemption or the diminution proposed was a special privilege that was asked for, and that no one should be exempted from the rate of taxation as fixed in this substitute.

It seems to me that this is a complete reversal of the act and effect and the whole theory of the proposed legislation. Everything that has been said in this Chamber in behalf of the substitute or amendment has been a special plea. The substitute itself is a gross mass of special privileges of the most offensive kind.

It now appears that the President last December was perfectly right in informing the country that there was a surplus in the Treasury and in asking also that taxation should be reduced. The point misconceived was as to where the relief should come, he being of the opinion that relief should come to the tax-paying many, the multitude of the people; whereas it seems that, after all, the relief should come to the maimed, crippled, wounded, moribund corporations engaged in the manufacture of the protected articles, doomed to decay and destruction unless they be perpetually pensioned for total disability by the provisions of this bill.

Instead of any amendment being a special privilege, the bill itself is a vast conservatory of choice plants of monopoly to be fed and forced by the sweat of the laboring masses and by every kind of unjust, oppressive, and unnecessary exaction. This measure itself is a paradise, the very garden of the gods of unjust monopolies, a paradise situate hard by the country of corruption and decay, and situate also very near the level of that Dead Sea which conceals alike the ashes and the iniquities of Sodom.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], which will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 568 it is proposed to strike out the words "six-tenths of 1 cent" and insert "six mills," and in lines 570 and 571 to strike out "six-tenths of 1 cent" and insert the words "six mills."

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GEORGE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I am not sure whether I am paired or not; I have been so differently paired. I shall vote "nay" if I am not paired, unless some Senator on the other side will say that I should not. I have been paired, I believe, with three or four Senators at different times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia desire to have his vote recorded?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I vote in the negative.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 24, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANCE. In paragraph 150, line 567, before the words "wire gauge," I move to strike out "6" and insert "5;" so as to read:

Not smaller than No. 5 wire gauge.

I will state the reason why I move the amendment. The present law reads:

Iron or steel rivet, screw, nail, and fence wire rods, round, in coils and loops, not lighter than No. 5 wire gauge, valued at 3½ cents or less per pound, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

The wire ordinarily used for fencing by the farmers is less than No. 6, and therefore comes in under the clause—

Manufactures of iron and other metals not otherwise provided for shall pay a duty of 40 per cent.

Instead of designating this as fencing-wire and increasing the duty on it from 40 to 47 per cent. openly, by simply changing the gauge of the wire one number and inserting No. 6, it is placed under a duty of six-tenths of a cent per pound, which is, I suppose, done in deference to the great service rendered the protectionists in the late election by the agricultural classes, especially of New York, who, we were told the other day, overcame by their rural virtues and enlightenment the vice and iniquity of the great cities of New York and Brooklyn. This is the way, I suppose, you undertake to pay them for their kindness, by swelling up by the change of a word, in a manner that would not strike anybody perhaps until the damage was done, the duty upon them from 40 to 47 per cent., as is displayed by the schedule.

I move, as I have said, to strike out the word "six" and insert "five," so that it will be not less than No. 5 wire gauge, and remit the fencing-wire used by the farmers of the country to the 40 per cent. schedule, where the present law places it. I desire to call the attention of the farmers of the country to this method which "the friends of American industry" are taking to encourage their industry, to wit, by increasing the duties on the implements of their business.

Mr. ALLISON. We have had a fine illustration just now of the fact that the Senator from North Carolina has not studied this bill. The particular item that he has discussed in no sense affects the farmer or fence-wire. As a matter of fact, in the Senate bill (and I call his attention to that now because it doubtless escaped him), the next paragraph is the one where fence-wire is considered, and there we have reduced the duty below the Mills bill, while every amendment thus far moved by him and his associates has been the rate fixed in the Mills bill. The next paragraph relates to wire rods from which fence-wire is made. This relates to all wire rods. Of course fence-wire is made from this as well as other wire.

The only change in this paragraph from existing law is, that we have reduced the value from 3½ to 3 cents a pound; that is to say, fence-wire valued at less than 3 cents a pound shall come in at such a rate. As a matter of fact, if the Senator will turn to the table which he has before him prepared by the experts, he will observe that all these wire rods come in at a less valuation than 1½ cents.

Another change is that we have introduced into this paragraph No. 6 wire rod instead of No. 5. In the tariff act of 1883 rods of No. 5 and above were classified as wire rods; thinner than No. 5, or smaller than No. 5, were classified as wire. That was the intention of the classification, but under a ruling of the Treasury Department wire rods were rolled less than No. 5, to wit, down to No. 6, and they came in at 45 per cent. ad valorem.

The Senator will see if he will examine these tables (I think it is perfectly clear from the tables themselves), that there have been undervaluations. All this paragraph proposes is to provide that wire rods down to No. 6 and all thinner or smaller than No. 6 shall be regarded as wire under this provision.

It was supposed when the tariff law of 1883 was passed that this was the point of difference between a wire rod and wire, but as a matter of fact wire rods have been rolled as thin as No. 6, and the fencing-wire which is drawn from those rods and other wire is a wire that is drawn, whilst this is a rod that is rolled.

I agree that the general effect of this phraseology will be to slightly increase the average ad valorem on importations of wire rods, but if I can gather the illustration of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] who elucidated this question so a few moments ago, it will not add the one-thousandth part of a cent to the cost of wire rods, and it will have no effect whatever upon the question of wire.

I call the attention of my friend again to the fact that we have reduced the duty on wire as compared with the Mills bill.

Mr. VANCE. I do not know that I am authorized to accept point blank the authority of the Senator from Iowa on the matter of wires and chains, since he was unable the other day to distinguish between the chain which confined a lap-dog and the chain with which a mule pulls a plow. But, taking it for granted that this is the rod from which the wire is made, I certainly can not accept his conclusion that the increasing of the cost of the materials from which the wire is made will not increase the cost of the wire itself, unless, indeed, we take it in the usual protective sense, that the higher the tax the cheaper the article, which is the way in which everything is argued here.

The Senator admits that by the change of classification, by the change of this word which I offer to strike out, the duty is increased. He says it is increased very slightly. According to the estimates of the Treasury Department, which I have before me, it is increased from 40 to 47 per cent., which is about 15 per cent. on the article itself, and why that should be done is the question.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the wire rods between No. 5 and No. 6, which he is discussing now, come in at 45 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. At 40 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. At 45 per cent., I will say to the Senator.

Mr. VANCE. I have the law before me.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will look at it carefully, he will see that I am right about it. It is 45 per cent. ad valorem, so that on the statement now made by the Senator there is only an increase of 2 per cent.

Mr. VANCE. It is only an increase of how much?

Mr. ALLISON. It is only an ad valorem increase of 2 per cent. All these now come in under a 45 per cent. ad valorem duty, and the Senator says that the average statement, as shown by Treasury experts, is 47 per cent. The result undoubtedly will be that a great many of these rods will come in cheaper than they do under existing law, and some of them higher.

Mr. VANCE. The Senator doubtless has the same statement before him which I have, the estimates of the Treasury Department, and he will see that they make the duty under the present law upon these rods 40.66 per cent., and the estimate for the duty under the Senate amendment is 47.55 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator misunderstands me; I did not make myself understood. In the existing law there are two classes of wire rods, one of them wire rods down to No. 5 wire gauge. Now they roll rods down to No. 6 wire gauge. All rods coming in down to No. 5 wire gauge come in at six-tenths of a cent a pound, and all wire rods thinner than No. 5, to wit, No. 6, come in at 45 per cent. ad valorem. So this clause now under consideration only affects one gauge of wire rods, namely, No. 6, and No. 6 under existing law, as shown by the table right before me, comes in at 45 per cent. ad valorem. Therefore the only change in this schedule is a change excluding one gauge of wire rods.

Mr. VANCE. Now, while the Senator is up and before he takes his seat, will he tell us why there was a necessity for including that other number that the manufacturers have got to rolling, which comes in under the 45 per cent. law, and increasing the rate on it? What was the object of that?

Mr. ALLISON. I will tell the Senator very readily. I undertook to give the reason a moment ago.

When we passed the tariff act of 1883, No. 5 wire gauge was the smallest wire rod provided for and the smallest that was rolled at that time. That came in at six-tenths of a cent a pound. In order to evade that duty of six-tenths of a cent a pound they began to roll in Belgium and Germany wire rods of No. 6 wire gauge, just to bring them within the 45 per cent. ad valorem duty. What was the object of that? The first object was to escape the specific duty; the second object was to enable them to undervalue these rods; and it is a singular fact, taking these tables as an illustration, that No. 5 wire rods are invoiced as costing more than No. 6, as shown by these tables, when a No. 6 is finer and must go through the rolls once more. It does not require a man to be very much of an expert to know that the thinner you make these rods or the smaller you make them the more expensive they are to make. Of course one single gauge would probably make very little difference. It was to correct this incongruity in the existing law that we put the No. 6 instead of No. 5, and then we have added as a proviso that all smaller than No. 6 shall be regarded as wire and pay duty accordingly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question right there. I understood him to state just now that wire which had more work on it sold cheaper than the wire with less work on account of the lighter tariff.

Mr. ALLISON. No, I did not say it was sold cheaper; not by any means.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly did not make a blunder of that kind. I say that they are invoiced cheaper and undervalued in order to escape the specific duty of the tariff. That is what I said.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I understood the Senator to use the word "cost"—that they cost less.

Mr. ALLISON. No; they cost more, but they are invoiced at a less price for the purpose of escaping the specific duty of the existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], which will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 150, line 567, it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "five;" so as to read:

150. Wire rods.—Rivet, screw, nail, fence, and other iron or steel wire rods, whether round, oval, flat, or square, in coils or loops or in any other shape, not smaller than No. 5 wire gauge, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber during the debate on public business, but I have the statement of an expert in regard to this provision in the bill that struck me with some surprise. I have not been able to go through it and analyze it completely, but the statement is this:

Wire rods for fence wire, nails, etc., not smaller than No. 5 wire gauge, now pay six-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

The Senate substitute includes rods not smaller than No. 6 at this rate, which now enter at 45 per cent. and of which 247,730,164 pounds were imported in 1887, at an average value of eleven one-hundredths cent per pound, and on which the rate at duties named of six-tenths cent per pound would be increased from 45 to 54.54 per cent., an increase of duties on this item of $290,712.08, while all rolled rods below No. 6 are classed as drawn wire, at 1¼ cents per pound, an increase impossible to estimate, but clearly out of all proportion.

That is an enormous increase to put upon this item. As a matter of course it is out of all proportions to other items in this schedule.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the vote is taken I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that his amendment, as now proposed, would increase the duty on No. 6 wire rod from six-tenths of a cent to 1¼ cents a pound.

Mr. VANCE. Then it will make it cheaper for the farmer, and the farmer will risk it.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired for the afternoon with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. I should vote "nay" but for that.

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STANFORD (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. HEARST], who is absent.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], whom I do not see in the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum not being present, as disclosed by the vote, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. VANCE. Can the call be dispensed with?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be dispensed with by unanimous consent, and the Chair can ascertain, if there be no objection, by count whether a quorum be present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We should be then just where we were before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Davis,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Bate,	Dawes,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sherman,
Berry,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Spooner,

Colquitt,	Hiscock,	Riddleberger,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. If there be no objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. VANCE. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the call for the yeas and nays on his amendment. If there be no objection, the Chair will again put the question on the amendment by the sound.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

Mr. VEST. Before that paragraph is passed by I want to put on record a communication from the New Haven Wire Company. I will ask the Secretary to read it, and I will not make any remarks. That company, as I said yesterday, ask for protection against the American wire-rod manufacturers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

ARGUMENT OF THE NEW HAVEN WIRE COMPANY, OF NEW HAVEN, CONN., IN BEHALF OF A DUTY OF FOUR-TENTHS CENT PER POUND ON WIRE RODS.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., August 6, 1888.

To the Committee on Finance, United States Senate:

On behalf of the New Haven Wire Company, which is compelled to buy its raw material in the shape of wire rods either of American or foreign mills, and of about twenty other wire mills similarly situated, I respectfully ask that the duty on fence and rivet wire rods of either iron or steel, when valued at 1½ cents per pound or less, be fixed at four-tenths cent per pound. The larger wire mills roll their own rods, but prefer to sell the product of their rod trains in the shape rather of finished wire than of rods; so that those wire mills which have no rod trains are forced to pay high prices for their American rods or use the foreign. In either case the price is determined by the cost of the foreign rods here, so that a reduction in duty would inure to the benefit of all these wire mills, whether they use foreign or domestic material. These mills employ more labor than all the rod trains in the country, and have a capacity to produce more than half of the wire which the country consumes. Under the tariff of 1883 their business has continually suffered at the hands of the mills rolling their own rods, and they now need protection not against foreign competition, but against the high charges of the American rod mills.

By the act of 1883 the duty on steel rods was fixed at six-tenths cent per pound on No. 5 and larger sizes. Although there had been some rods smaller than No. 5 imported, yet the bulk of the rods were No. 5 and larger, and no specific provision was made for any smaller size. Such sizes, therefore, came in under the "omnibus clause" as "manufactures of steel not otherwise provided for" at 45 per cent. ad valorem.

Prior to the act of 1883 all steel rods had come in under the omnibus clause at 30 per cent. The specific duty of six-tenths cent per pound was fixed by Congress after a careful hearing of all the parties in interest and was then the equivalent of 35 per cent. Soon after the passage of the act, however, the foreign values of Be-semer material fell so that the ad valorem equivalent of six-tenths has never been less than 45 per cent., but has at times equaled 60 per cent., and is now about 55 per cent. Coincident with this fall in values came an improvement in the processes of rolling rods abroad by which a No. 6 rod could be furnished at about the same cost as a No. 5, and the bulk of the importations for the past four years has been of No. 6. These have, as stated above, come in at 45 per cent., which is at the present time about one-half cent per pound.

The request of Mr. George T. Oliver, of Pittsburgh, speaking on behalf of his company and other American rod-makers, that the duty on all sizes of rods should be fixed at six-tenths of a cent per pound is therefore in substance a request that the present rate of duty should be advanced on the bulk of the importations from 45 per cent. to 55 per cent., an increase of about nearly 25 per cent.

The consumers of wire rods, on the other hand, maintain that not only is there no propriety of making any such advance, or, indeed, any advance, but that the present rate of duty might be reduced without in any way crippling the American rod mills. The present cost of American billets in Pittsburgh is $28 to $28.50 per ton; of wire rods, $41 to $41.50. It is not disputed that a modern Garrett train employing twenty-five or thirty men, has turned out 75 tons of rods in eleven hours, and at a cost, making all proper allowances, of not exceeding $8 per ton.

Assuming that its annual production was only half that (or 75 tons daily when running double time), the margin of profit would exceed $100,000 per annum; so that the train would nearly pay for itself during the first year. This clear margin of $5 per ton is due to the present tariff; for while the American mills now sell the greater part of the rods used in the country, they hold the price just below the cost of foreign rods with duty and inland freight added, and the cost to the consumer is thus dependent closely on the duty. As the labor-cost of each ton of rods thus rolled is less than $3, the need of any increase of the duty in order to protect the laborer is not clearly seen.

It is not necessary, however, to base any argument on estimates of the cost of rolling rods in this country. While all such estimates may be disputed, it can not be denied that the great increase in the number and capacity of rod mills in this country since the enactment of the tariff of 1883 would not have taken place if there was not a handsome margin in the business, and a margin furthermore that was large enough to stand some reduction in the tariff rate. In 1883 steel rods were rolled at not more than five or six mills, and the total capacity did not greatly exceed 50,000 tons annually. There are now nine rod mills in operation, and another building, with an aggregate capacity of about 250,000 tons per annum.

The proportion of their product to the imports has steadily increased, so that it to-day is more than half of the entire consumption of the country. (The importations of wire rods during first six months of 1887 were 69,432 tons; of 1888, 38,916 tons.) Surely an industry that has made such rapid strides under the present tariff does not need any further legislative help, nor is it in a position where reasonable reduction of the duty will inflict irreparable disaster on it.

If the present duty on wire rods were halved, while the duty on billets is unchanged, the Pittsburgh rod mills could still sell their rods at a profit and keep foreign rods out of that market; while at the same time, the seaboard wire mills, which are prevented by inland freights from using American rods and are compelled to pay the present duty on their foreign rods, would have some hope of life. It does not seem unreasonable, therefore, to ask that a beginning in the reduction of duty should be made, and four-tenths cent per pound is certainly an ample protection for the American rod mill.

The fluctuations in the price of rods have resulted in such variations of the ad valorem rate of any specific duty that such a method of fixing the tariff should not be longer followed. No one will pretend to say that Congress, when it fixed the duty in 1883 at the specific equivalent of 35 per cent., contemplated that within four years that specific duty would by the mere fall in prices rise to 60 per cent. The market values of these rods are well known both abroad and here. There is no chance for any evasion of the tariff, as the records of the custom-houses show; and it is submitted, therefore, that the will of Congress will be better observed throughout all future fluctuations by making the duty ad valorem than by adhering to a specific duty. If the latter method is, however, preferred, it is suggested that ample protection to the American rod mills and some share of the necessary reduction demanded by the condition of the American wire mills will be secured by making the duty four-tenths cent per pound on all sizes of wire rods.

This is a higher rate ad valorem than was contemplated by Congress in fixing the act of 1883, and leaves the American rod mills with about one-half of their present margin of profit.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

THE NEW HAVEN WIRE COMPANY,
By SAMUEL A. GALPIN, Receiver.

Mr. VEST. Before we leave that paragraph I move, in lines 568 and 570, to strike out "six-tenths" and insert "four-tenths" in each of those lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 568, after the word "pound," it is proposed to strike out "six-tenths" and insert "four-tenths;" and in line 570, after the word "pound," to strike out "six-tenths" and insert "four-tenths;" so as to make the paragraph read:

150. Wire rods.—Rivet, screw, nail, fence, and other iron or steel wire rods, whether round, oval, flat, or square, in coils or loops or in any other shape, not smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, four-tenths of 1 cent per pound; and iron or steel flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing, valued at 3 cents or less per pound, four-tenths of 1 cent per pound: Provided, That all iron or steel rods, whether rolled or drawn, smaller than No. 6 wire gauge, shall be classed and dutiable as wire.

Mr. ALDRICH. We could very easily place upon the record the refutation of many of the statements made in the communication just read if it was proper to take up the time of the Senate in that way.

Mr. VEST. I have nothing to do with that. These gentlemen are manufacturers, and, as far as I know, reputable persons. They are certainly not Democratic politicians, and for that reason their statements ought to be entitled to some credit on this question; I mean so far as the other side of the Senate is concerned. I said yesterday that nothing any Democrat could say upon this question would receive any sort of respectful attention, and when I state that these are not Democratic politicians, and therefore their statements ought to be received with some credit, as a matter of course, I mean from the other side of the Chamber, who are defending the interests of the manufacturer particularly. They ought to receive these statements with respectful consideration.

There are two statements, however, in that communication which attracted my attention, especially coming from that quarter, and one of them is that the manufacturers of wire rods in this country keep their prices just below the foreign cost with the tariff added, thereby making the sales to the consumers upon that basis; and the second is that they demand or ask from Congress protection, not against the foreign importer, but against the American manufacturers of wire rods.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. ALLISON. I think this is an important question, and perhaps I ought to say a word upon it.

I understand the amendment of the Senator from Missouri proposes to reduce the rate of duty two-tenths of a cent a pound. The difficulty about making that adjustment is that wire rods are made from steel billets, the steel billets in turn being made from pig-iron. The existing duty upon pig-iron is three-tenths of a cent a pound, or $6.72 a ton. The present duty upon steel billets is practically 45 per cent. ad valorem. Now, the Senator proposes on the wire rod, which is a product first of the pig-iron and next of the steel billet, a less rate of duty than is imposed upon the raw material of which these wire rods are made. Manifestly, if we provide four-tenths of a cent a pound on wire rods, we should have three-tenths upon billets of steel and a smaller sum for pig-iron, and that is all there is in this question.

Prior to 1883 there were no wire rods rolled in this country practically. The rod mills have been built since that time, and, I think, the production of wire rods now in this country reaches nearly 300,000 tons. The mills are located in every part of our country. One was opened last August at Joliet, Ill., and another has just now been completed in Chicago. These rod mills are being built all over the country, and the competition will undoubtedly keep the price down to the cost of the production and a very small profit added.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that, notwithstanding the fact which he alleges, that the American producers put the price at the foreign price with the duty added, there were imported in 1887 334,000,000 pounds, or about 150,000 tons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senator from Missouri desires their separation, the two amendments will be treated as one question. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendments?

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who does not appear to be in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. EVARTS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. DAWES. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Coke,	Payne,	Vance,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Ransom,	Walthall,

So the amendments were rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read paragraph 151, as follows:

151. Wire.—Wire made of iron or steel not smaller than No. 10 wire gauge, 1¼ cents per pound; smaller than No. 10 and not smaller than No. 16 wire gauge, 1½ cents per pound; smaller than No. 16 and not smaller than No. 26 wire gauge, 2½ cents per pound; smaller than No. 26 wire gauge, 3 cents per pound: Provided, That iron or steel wire covered with cotton, silk, or other material, and wire commonly known as crinoline, corset, and hat wire, shall pay 4 cents per pound in addition to the foregoing rates: And provided further, That no article made from iron or steel wire, or of which iron or steel wire is a component part of chief value, shall pay a less rate of duty than the iron or steel wire from which it is made either wholly or in part: And provided further, That iron or steel wire cloths, and iron or steel wire nettings made in meshes of any form, shall pay a duty equal in amount to that imposed on iron or steel wire of the same gauge, and 2 cents per pound in addition thereto. There shall be paid on galvanized iron or steel wire (except fence-wire) one-half of 1 cent per pound in addition to the rate imposed on the wire of which it is made; on iron-wire rope and wire strand, 1 cent per pound in addition to the rate imposed on the wire of which it is made; on steel-wire rope and wire strand, 2 cents per pound in addition to the rates imposed on the wire of which it is made: Provided further, That all iron or steel wire valued at more than 10 cents per pound shall pay a duty of not less than 45 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In this paragraph I see there is an exemption of fence-wire from the additional duty of one-half of 1 cent per pound when it is galvanized. I remember in 1883 when that subject came up we had quite a debate upon it, and an amendment was offered exempting fence-wire from the duty of one-half of 1 cent a pound when it was galvanized.

I see in paragraph 150 the bill recognizes not only wire as fence material, but also "iron or steel flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing." If that latter class has not the benefit of exemption when galvanized that is provided in paragraph 151, I want to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the word "wire," in line 591, so as to give the manufacturers of the flat when galvanized the exemption also from the additional duty imposed upon galvanized material. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "wire" does not occur in line 591.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should have said in line 594, in the exception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 594, after the words "except fence-wire," inclosed in parenthesis, it is proposed to insert:

And iron and steel flat, with longitudinal ribs for the manufacture of fencing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is to put that within the exception, so that the manufacturer of fencing-wire and fencing-flat, as it is called, shall be exempt from the additional duty of one-half of 1 cent a pound because of its being galvanized.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the amendment be repeated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 504, after the words "(except fence-wire)" it is proposed to insert "and iron and steel flat, with longitudinal ribs, for the manufacture of fencing."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have used the very language there which is used in paragraph 150.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that this paragraph does not apply to steel flats with longitudinal ribs. This only applies to fence-wire. I think if he wants to exempt these flats from the provision it ought to be inserted in some other paragraph.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not see any other place for it.

Mr. ALLISON. In the paragraph relating to galvanized sheet-iron or some one of those paragraphs. I think the Senator is right about it. I think that class of fencing material should also be exempt.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have not seen any exemption anywhere, but it occurs to me as obviously just as well as beneficial to the persons who are called upon to use it. There is a very great amount of this flat material used for fencing, superseding very largely the wire fencing in many sections of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware desire to have the words sent to the desk by him included in the parenthesis?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, I want this included in the parenthesis as part of the exemption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 602, I move to strike out "45" and insert "35."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 602, before the words "per centum," it is proposed to strike out "45" and insert "35;" so as to make the last proviso of the paragraph read:

Provided further, That all iron or steel wire, valued at more than 10 cents per pound, shall pay a duty of not less than 35 per centum ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. In line 583, before the word "cents," I move to strike out "4" and insert "3." That refers to "iron or steel wire covered with cotton, silk, or other material." It seems to be an increase, according to the estimate of the Treasury people, from an ad valorem of 10.97 per cent. to 45 per cent., a difference of about 450 per cent., which I think is a right smart increase in a bill that proposes to reduce revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 583, before the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out "4" and insert "3;" so as to read:

Provided, That iron or steel wire covered with cotton, silk, or other material, and wire commonly known as crinoline, corset, and hat wire, shall pay 3 cents per pound in addition to the foregoing rates.

Mr. ALLISON. Four cents a pound is the rate in the existing law, and the ad valorem is very light. It works very well, and I see no reason why it should be changed.

Mr. VANCE. It is stated in the analysis of the Treasury Department that in the existing law the rate is 3 cents.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sorry to find an error in the Treasury Department's statement, because I supposed that was really rather an accurate statement. The rate is 4 cents a pound. I will have the law in a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where do you find it in your statement at 4 cents a pound?

Mr. VANCE. Four cents a pound! Then I ask leave to make my amendment "4 cents," which is what I designed it to be instead of "3," and make it the same as the present law instead of 45 per cent., which increases the rate to 400 per cent., as I said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator indicate the precise amendment he desires to submit to the Senate?

Mr. VANCE. It is in line 583, to strike out the word "four."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 583 it is proposed to strike out the word "four;" so as to read:

Provided, That iron or steel wire covered with cotton, silk, or other material, and wire commonly known as crinoline, corset, and hat wire, shall pay — cents per pound in addition to the foregoing rates.

Mr. VANCE. No, Mr. President, that is not it. I withdraw the amendment. I find that the Treasury statement and the bill do not correspond, and I was led into an error. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed and continued the reading, as follows:

152. Files, file blanks, rasps, and floats, of all cuts and kinds: Four inches in length and under, 35 cents per dozen; over 4 inches in length and under 9 inches, 70 cents per dozen; 9 inches in length and under 14 inches, $1.30 per dozen; 14 inches in length and over, $2 per dozen.

153. Steel ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, and slabs, by whatever process made; die blocks or blanks; billets and bars and tapered or beveled bars; steamer, crank, and other shafts; shafting; wrist or crank pins; connecting rods and piston rods; pressed, sheared, or stamped shapes; saw plates, wholly or partially manufactured; hammer molds or swaged steel; gun-barrel molds not in bars; alloys used as substitutes for steel tools; all descriptions and shapes of dry sand, loam, or iron-molded steel castings; sheets and plates not specially enumerated or provided for in this act; steel in all forms and shapes not specially enumerated or provided for in this act; all of the above valued at 1 cent per pound or less, five-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 1 cent and not above 1.4 cents per pound, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 1.4 cents and not above 1.8 cents per pound, eight-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 1.8 cents and not above 2.2 cents per pound, nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 2.2 cents and not above 3 cents per pound, 1.2 cents per pound; valued above 3 cents and not above 4 cents per pound, 1.6 cents per pound; valued above 4 cents and not above 7 cents per pound, 2 cents per pound; valued above 7 cents and not above 10 cents per pound, 2.8 cents per pound; valued above 10 cents and not above 13 cents per pound, 3½ cents per pound; valued above 13 cents per pound, 45 per cent. ad valorem.

154. Plates.—Steel plates engraved, stereotype plates, electrotype plates, and plates of other materials, engraved or lithographed, for printing, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

155. Saws.—Cross-cut saws, 6 cents per linear foot; mill, pit, and drag saws, not over 9 inches wide, 8 cents per linear foot; over 9 inches wide, 13 cents per linear foot; circular saws, 30 per cent. ad valorem; hand, back, and all other saws, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out "forty," before the words "per cent.," in the last item, "hand, back, and all other saws not specially enumerated or provided for in this act," and insert "thirty," which is the amount named in the House bill.

Mr. President, there is no small item—and this is not a very small item either—in this bill that illustrates this matter of tariff taxation more fully and completely than this duty upon saws.

I do not want, as a matter of course, to thrash over old straw, and I shall not take up any time unnecessarily, but the substratum of this whole protective system is, as I understand it, that it protects the infant industries of the United States so that they can become self-sustaining and furnish cheap goods to the domestic market. Either that is the correct basis of the system, or else it is the worst system ever invented by mortal man for the consumers.

The reports of imports and exports show that in 1887 we exported $1,305,706 worth of saws; in 1888 we increased that export $354,021 and exported $1,659,727 worth. We produced in 1880 $3,944,105 worth of product, on which the labor cost was $1,226,370.

I assert here to-day that the saw manufacturers of the United States, with this 40 per cent. protective duty, export to Canada each year a large amount of their manufactured articles, pay 30 per cent. to get into the Canadian market, undersell the British manufacturers there, and make a profit of 15 per cent., and that is protection! They charge the people of the United States this 40 per cent., or the largest portion of it, under this protective system, and then go right across the line, pay 30 per cent. gate-money to get into Canada, meet the English manufacturer face to face, undersell him, and make 15 per cent. profit after paying 30 per cent. duty to get in.

On page 127 of the testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee of the House there is a very interesting statement made by Mr. J. E. Emerson, of Beaver Falls, Pa., who lives near my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], who was the chairman of the national committee of the Republican party in the last canvass.

This gentleman proclaims himself—I will not read his whole statement unless some Senator on the other side wants it, and it is mighty good reading all of it—proclaims himself a protectionist of the simon-pure stripe, says he believes it is necessary for the welfare of this country, says he is a saw manufacturer and has been all his life. I want to call attention to this statement:

I spoke awhile ago of the competition which American manufacturers are sometimes compelled to undergo in the case of forced sales or undersales. Take Canada, for instance. In Canada I think that all the plate-steel used for making saws is admitted duty free from England. You all know that Canada is a large lumber country, and there are a great many saw-mills there. I have always sustained a trade in Canada, and I confess that I have oftentimes sold my saws there at less profit than I have sold them in America. And why? Because I had a surplus, an overflow on hand, and I wanted to get rid of it, just as the manufacturers of Europe send their surplus to this country and sell it at lower prices than the cost of production sometimes.

In Canada the price of labor averages about 33 per cent. less than the price of labor in the United States. They have large saw-works there where they manufacture saws, and they can import the steel plate from England free of duty into Canada—the same plates on which we pay a duty of 3 cents a pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem. Canada did have a duty, which they charged us, of 15 per cent. on steel plates, but the manufacturers thought that did not protect the Canadian manufacturers, and the duty was raised to 30 per cent. And what has been the result? We are selling plates to Canada to-day. And why?

Now mark the reason:

Because the protection which we have has resulted in the encouragement of manufactures of all kinds, so that we are not only competing with foreign producers, but we are excelling them in the superiority of our saws. They are made of American manufactured steel. And how came we to have American manufactured steel? Because we encouraged American competition and American skill, and we are making better plates to-day in Pittsburgh than they are making in England or than they can make in England.

Now, it is asked that the duties on steel plates be reduced, and why? Who asks it? Not the user of steel. I never made a pound of steel, but I use steel, and it is for my interest to buy steel as cheaply as I can. But my interests go a little beyond the present, and I believe that my interests are advanced by encouraging American manufacturers. I am paying from $80 to $150 a ton for steel plates less than I was paying some years ago for the same quality of steel plates, and the steel plates that I buy are of American manufacture.

Now—

Said Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas—

you say that you sell your saws successfully in Canada?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes; not in large quantities. We pay 30 per cent. duty on them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And you sell them there at a profit?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes, sir; we have a profit on them or we would not sell them.

Mr. ALLISON. Who pays that 30 per cent. duty?

Mr. VEST. That depends.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely want to understand the subject.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] undertook to prove to us yesterday that the consumer did not pay it.

Mr. ALLISON. I want to know from the Senator who pays it.

Mr. VEST. Unquestionably Mr. Emerson paid it to get into the Canadian market.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. VEST. Then he sells at a profit and makes 15 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. He does not say that.

Mr. VEST. He does not say that? He says he pays 30 per cent. duty on them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And you sell them there at a profit?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes, sir; we have a profit on them or we would not sell them.

Now, does the Senator from Iowa want any man who is not fit to be sent to a lunatic asylum under a writ of de lunatico inquirendo to believe that this man would pay 30 per cent. and ignore it in his calculations and will say he made a profit?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think that settles the question. He says he sold the saws at a profit.

Mr. VEST. Exactly.

Mr. ALLISON. But he does not say what the price paid for them was, nor does he say whether the consumer or the producer paid it; and I want the Senator to say whether this manufacturer paid that duty or not, in his opinion. I do not express an opinion; I want the Senator from Missouri to say who he thinks paid that duty, whether the manufacturer or the consumer.

Mr. VEST. There is one thing beyond any sort of question, and that is the point I am making, that this gentleman paid 30 per cent. to get into the Canadian market and then did not lose money, but made a profit.

Mr. ALLISON. That is not the point.

Mr. VEST. That is the point. Now they ask for more protection.

Mr. ALLISON. I want the Senator to answer me whether, in his judgment, he believes that the 30 per cent. came out of the profits of the manufacturer in this country or was paid by the consumer of that saw in Canada.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slightest doubt that the thing operates the same everywhere. The manufacturer paid it and collected it out of the man in Canada, just exactly as is done with every case of goods that comes into this country. I do not mean to say that there are no instances like that mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the other day, where bankrupt goods are brought here and put on the market and sold for less than the cost. But is that the regular, average, ordinary transaction? On the contrary, the man who pays his money to enter the market collects it from the man to whom he sells.

Suppose there was a wall around the city of Washington to-day, and a man comes with his produce and can not get through this wall but by one gate, and this municipality here puts a tax upon his goods of 10 per cent. for gate-money. He can sell for so much outside, but he pays 10 per cent. to get inside, and does anybody believe that he throws that away? He would be a lunatic to do it. He puts it upon the cost of the article to him as much as if it was the product of his muscle and brain and nerve. That is all of it, and that is the point in this whole discussion.

If the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is correct, and now the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], as a matter of course, if the tariff is a blessing, it should be put up a thousand per cent. and foreigners made to pay the whole expenses of our Government, while we sit here and suck our thumbs and do nothing. If the other side won the election on that sort of moonshine, it will not last long. The American people may be humbugged once in awhile, but the real good sense of the people of the country will come back to them.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Does not this gentleman state that this is surplus?

Mr. VEST. No, sir. I beg pardon, he does not.

Mr. DAWES. And that he, even like the English producer, sells below cost?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; not in regard to this transaction.

Mr. DAWES. He says in that way it is a gain to him.

Mr. VEST. He says that he has done what the Senator says, but that this is his ordinary course of business. He says he maintains an annual trade with Canada and pays 30 per cent. gate-money or tariff tax and makes money. Then he comes to the American market and says "Protect me, I am an infant." Now let us read the balance of what he says:

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE—

Now I come to the milk in the cocoanut directly—

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. At how much less per cent. do you sell your saws in Canada than you sell the same saws in the United States?

Now we will find out.

Mr. EMERSON. I can not answer that question directly, but the saws that we sell there are of a certain class, large circular saws, on which there are larger profits than there are on the average saws. I think that we would discount them in Canada 15 per cent. less on the average than we would sell them for in the United States.

Fifteen per cent. he makes in the difference between the foreign market and his own countrymen.

The Canadians have found that we manufacture a better saw than they do, and they are willing to pay more for it. The Canadians pay part of this duty, not by special arrangement, but in the prices which they pay for our saws.

There is an answer to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Part of it.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course that is part of the tariff tax which comes off the consumer, not like the Senator from Vermont said, that it was a payment by the importer to keep up our Government.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then you get about 15 per cent. less for your saws in Canada than you get for them in the United States?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. You mean on that particular kind of saw?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes, on that which we have the largest trade in. We do not make hand-saws at all; but hand-saws are made by Disston & Co., Philadelphia, and find a market even in England.

In connection with that I want to read another——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is circular saws he is referring to, and they are not touched by the clause under consideration.

Mr. VEST. I understand that, but I read what this gentleman said in regard to hand-saws being made in Philadelphia and sent to the English market. That is the item I move this reduction upon, because on the others the Senate bill and the House bill agree.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the argument the Senator has read applies solely to circular saws.

Mr. VEST. I understand that, but it will do for all of them. It is the principle I am striking at. The gentlemen who want protection, staggering, trembling, falling through weakness, go right out of this country and sell for less to the foreign consumer than to our own people.

Mr. DAWES. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to a speech of Sir Charles Tupper, made in the Canadian Parliament, in which he says that the Mills bill had relieved them of $1,800,000 of duties which they paid into the Treasury of the United States; and when somebody asked him whether he meant to say that they paid the duty or that it was paid by the consumer, he said "everybody knows that we pay it."

Mr. VEST. Of course they paid it first. Mr. President, I have no objection to quoting Sir Charles Tupper if the Senator will also put in General Ben. Butler alongside of him. I read the other day from a speech of General Ben. Butler in which he spoke of the duty on the coat he had on, which was of cloth made in his factory, and he said, "What became of that duty? Did it go to labor?" "No," said he, "I put it into my pocket." If the Senator wants to put these distinguished witnesses side by side, I have not the slightest objection. But here is what I want to call attention to:

"Protest of one hundred and forty employés" of the Monhagen Saw Works of the Wheeler, Madden and Clemson Manufacturing Company, of the city of Middletown, State of New York. They oppose the Mills bill because it strikes down American labor, etc.—

For the reason that it proposes to place lumber on the free-list, thereby encouraging, if not largely transferring, its manufacture to Canada and other countries, where American saw manufacturers can not compete.

And yet Mr. Emerson says he has an annual trade with Canada and sells at a profit; but I have no doubt that all these workmen, under the impression that the Mills bill would destroy the exportation of saws and that we would have no further trade with Canada, went to the polls and voted the Republican ticket.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am glad they did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 648, before the words "per centum," it is proposed to strike out "forty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

155. Saws.—Cross-cut saws, 6 cents per linear foot; mill, pit, and drag saws, not over 9 inches wide, 8 cents per linear foot; over 9 inches wide, 13 cents per linear foot; circular saws, 30 per cent. ad valorem; hand, back, and all other saws, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I understand from the discussion which has been going on that the taxes imposed on these saws are wholly unnecessary for the protection of any interest in this country, that our manufacturers are able to manufacture and compete not only with the Canadian manufacturers but that hand-saws are manufactured in the city of Philadelphia and are sent to England and sold there.

We have heard a great deal of talk here about the benefit which protection is to labor, but the men who use these saws are as much laborers as any person who operates in a factory or a mill. The journeyman carpenter who uses these saws is compelled to buy his own case or chest of tools, and he is the party that you are now to tax for the benefit of manufacturers who do not need the protection of the tax, according to the statements that have been read here from the evidence delivered before the House committee, and yet you propose to make every journeyman carpenter, who is compelled to buy his saw before he can get a day's employment, pay a duty of 40 per cent. upon the saws which he is compelled to have in order to obtain employment from his boss.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my distinguished friend from Delaware how the American saw-user is abused by the present law or the proposed law? If the American saw now manufactured is sold in Great Britain and finds a market there, it must be as cheap as the British saw. If, therefore, you put saws entirely on the free-list and the American saw-user wishes to get a cheap saw and wishes to buy a British one, which is not half as good, he can not buy it as cheap as he can now, for the American saw and the British saw in London and Liverpool bear the same price.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I have no doubt in the world he would not be compelled to pay any more than the Englishman who buys our saws; but you have your protective tariff, and the English article can not come here, and the manufacturer of these saws raises his price; and in America he has the complete control of the market, and when he has a surplus on hand he sends it to England and sells at a profit there.

This is illustrated not only by this thing, but a manufacturer of a certain description of cotton goods told me that he was connected with five different mills and that certain lines of goods could be manufactured in this country as cheap as in Manchester, England, and he said, "I have now a contract to deliver 200 bales of white cotton goods in Manchester at Manchester prices," and yet that manufacturer would not have sold those goods to an American customer at the price for which he sold them in Manchester, for the reason that there is a protection given to that class of goods which raises them up and enables him to sell to the American customer at prices advanced beyond those for which they can be sold in Manchester. That is the way the tariff operates.

I have heard a great deal about protection to labor, but what I have heard in debate on this floor and what I have seen of the operations on the other side of the Chamber convince me that it is all a delusion. The laborer does not get any, or at least but very little, benefit from your protective policy. The price of labor in every calling of life is determined by the supply and demand of the labor needed. It is so in the agricultural community, and it is so in the mechanical industries of the country, and it is so in the manufacturing industries of the country. It is all a delusion and deception practiced upon the laborers of the country to hold out to them the idea that the protective policy is for their interest. I do not believe a word of it, and I do not think that any very intelligent operative in any of the mills or factories in this country who has examined the question will believe it. Do they not know that they are employed in the mills and factories at the very lowest rates that the manufacturers can procure their labor for? Do they not see it all around them in every calling of life that everybody employs labor at the cheapest rate he can?

Labor is not too well paid in this country in any calling. I should be glad to see the laborer better paid in every calling of life. You enrich the manufacturer by your protective tariff, and he derives the benefit of your protection. It is not the employés in his mill who are benefited.

Sir, the other day, if you were so anxious to protect the laborers of this country, why did you not strike off all the burden which you put upon the ties of the laboring man who grows the cotton? There are only between two and three million laborers in the factories and mills of this country; an equal number are engaged in the raising of cotton, and yet you will oppress that class of labor under the plea that you are going to benefit the men who are operating the mills!

Why, sir, this idea of protecting labor is all a delusion. Labor has to protect itself.

Who would be free, themselves must strike the blow.

And we have had strikes in this country; we have had resistance by the operatives because of the fact that they were not allowed sufficient means by their employers to support themselves and support their families. We are not blind. Many of us have traveled somewhat in this country, and have seen around the manufacturing establishments of the country the humble home of the operative. Get on the cars, pass around the suburbs of your cities, and what do you see? You see the manufactories, you see their long string of houses, built of cheap material, built in humble form, with a back yard of about 20 feet in the rear of the house in which are located all the modern improvements, the children on the door-steps, the wife out on the ash-banks, the dumping-ground, collecting the refuse fuel from the ashes, and on the same soil is the goat that gives milk to the family. And yet you talk about protecting labor! It is not protected. Labor will never have protection from the manufacturing interests of the country. It must depend upon itself, assert its rights, maintain its own dignity and its worth, and then perhaps it will command the wages to which it is entitled.

It is all a delusion to talk about protecting labor by a tariff. You can not protect labor in that way. There is no possible way in which you can protect it unless you open the Treasury and give a bounty to every man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow. You can not do it by giving him employment, if you constitute the manufacturer the trustee to divide the profit of the protection which you afford. He will pocket the whole of it himself, and get his employés as cheap as he can.

That is the universal experience, I think, everywhere, and it is not worth while to get up in the Senate or anywhere else and attempt to delude the people of this country on that subject, because every man who has any experience in life knows that labor is an article which is employed according to the demand. Sometimes labor will command a higher price, because it is needed very much more at one time than at another; but you can not regulate, you can not fix it definitely—the value of labor—because that depends upon the necessity which demands it, not only in manufacturing, but in every other industry in the country.

Here is a proposition to remit the tax upon articles used by laborers alone. Every man throughout the country who taxes a saw and goes to sawing lumber, that erects the houses, that makes the bridges, is a laborer, and yet it is proposed under this bill to inflict upon that laborer a tax which, by the testimony of manufacturers themselves, they do not need, because they can make saws at a price which enables them to sell them at a profit abroad as well as in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (after having voted in the negative). By request I will withdraw my vote and have it considered a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia withdraws his vote.

Mr. BLAIR. I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. CULLOM. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. The Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay" if present.

Mr. CHACE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. I did not observe that he was not in the Senate when I voted. I therefore withdraw my vote and announce the pair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island withdraws his vote.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Berry,	Coke,	Pugh,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Ransom,	Walthall,
Blodgett,	Gray,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Harris,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—24.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Paddock,	Stewart,
Davis,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—33.

Beck,	Dawes,	Hearst,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Brown,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Teller,
Butler,	George,	Morgan,	Vest,
Cameron,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Voorhees.
Chace,	Gorman,	Payne,
Colquitt,	Hale,	Plumb,
Daniel,	Hampton,	Quay,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANCE. I ask consent to recur at this time to paragraph 153, which has just been passed over. The Chief Clerk read it so rapidly that I could not keep up with him, and I omitted to offer an amendment that I desired to offer. In lines 635 and 636 I move to strike out the words "and not above 13 cents," and after the word "and" to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fourth."

The bill which we are considering makes a new classification of steel ingots, cogged ingots, blooms, slabs, die blocks or blanks, billets, bars, etc. The present law terminates at all valued at above 10 cents per pound, 2¼ cents a pound duty. The bill makes another classification:

Valued above 10 cents and not above 13 cents per pound, 3½ cents per pound.

I move, in lines 635 and 636, to strike out the words "and not above 13 cents," and after the word "and" to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fourth;" so as to read:

Valued above 10 cents per pound, 3¼ cents per pound.

Which is the present law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 635 it is proposed to strike out the words "and not above 13 cents," and in line 636 to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fourth;" so as to read:

Valued above 10 cents per pound, 3¼ cents per pound.

Mr. VANCE. I will simply remark that, according to the estimate of the Treasury Department, that additional change of classification increases the duty, which is now about 19½ per cent., to 45 per cent.—more than 100 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. TELLER. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Coke,	Ransom,	Walthall.
Berry,	Gray,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.
Blackburn,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Cockrell,	Pugh,	Vance,

NAYS—25.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Allison,	Hawley,	Paddock,	Stewart,
Chace,	Hiscock,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Davis,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sherman,

ABSENT—34.

Beck,	Dawes,	Hale,	Plumb,
Blair,	Eustis,	Hampton,	Quay,
Blodgett,	Evarts,	Hearst,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Stanford,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Teller,
Butler,	Frye,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cameron,	George,	Morgan,	Voorhees.
Colquitt,	Gibson,	Pasco,
Daniel,	Gorman,	Payne,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the "noes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I will ask the Senator from Arkansas to withdraw that motion in order that I may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I presume the Senator can make that motion after they vote the motion to adjourn down on the other side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are the yeas and nays desired by one-fifth of the Senators present?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. DAWES (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] or else I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] on this question of adjournment.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,
Berry,	Coke,	Pugh,	Vance,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Ransom,	Walthall.
Blodgett,	Gray,	Reagan,
Call,	Harris,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—23.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Chandler,	Hiscock,	Paddock,	Stewart,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Stockbridge,
Davis,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	Manderson,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—35.

Beck,	Dawes,	Hampton,	Quay,
Blair,	Evarts,	Hearst,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Sherman,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Butler,	Frye,	McPherson,	Teller,
Cameron,	George,	Morgan,	Vest,
Chace,	Gibson,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Payne,	Wilson, of Md.
Daniel,	Hale,	Plumb,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL PROVISIONS—MISCELLANEOUS.

156. No allowance or reduction of duties for partial loss or damage in consequence of rust or of discoloration shall be made upon any description of iron or steel, or upon any partly manufactured article of iron or steel, or upon any manufacture of iron and steel.

157. All metal produced from iron or its ores which is cast and malleable, of whatever description or form, without regard to the percentage of carbon contained therein, whether produced by cementation, or converted, cast, or made from iron ores by the crucible, Bessemer, Clapp-Griffiths, pneumatic, Thomas-Gilchrist, basic, Siemens-Martin, or open-hearth process, or by the equivalent of either, or by a combination of two or more of the processes or their equivalents, or by any fusion or other process which produces from iron or its ores a metal either granular or fibrous in structure, which is cast and malleable, excepting what is known as malleable-iron castings, shall be classed and denominated as steel.

158. All articles not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, wholly or partly manufactured, made from sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel herein provided for, or of which such sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel shall be the material of chief value, shall not pay a lower rate of duty than that imposed on the sheet, plate, hoop, band, or scroll iron or steel from which they are made, or which shall be the material of chief value.

159. On all iron or steel bars, rods, strips, or steel sheets, of whatever shape, other than the polished, planished, or glanced sheet-iron or sheet-steel hereinbefore provided for, and on all iron or steel bars of irregular shape or section, which are cold rolled, cold hammered, or polished in any way in addition to the ordinary process of hot rolling or hammering, there shall be paid one-fourth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the rates provided in this act; and on steel circular-saw plates there shall be paid 1 cent per pound in addition to the rate provided in this act.

Mr. ALDRICH. After the word "act" the words should be inserted "for steel saw-plates," at the close of the paragraph, in line 685, striking out the period.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to paragraph 159, after the word "act," the words "for steel saw-plates."

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the clause be read as it is proposed to be amended.

The CHIEF CLERK. So as to read:

And on steel circular-saw plates there shall be paid 1 cent per pound in addition to the rate provided in this act for steel saw-plates.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE. Is it understood that we may recur to a paragraph which has been passed over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the understanding and agreement of the Senate.

Mr. VANCE. The two paragraphs which have just been read seem to me to be very important, but I am not prepared to give any analysis of them this evening. I should like to have permission to recur to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

160. Antimony, as regulus or metal, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound.

161. Argentine, albata, or German silver, unmanufactured, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

162. Brass, in bars or pigs, old brass, clippings from brass or Dutch-metal, and old sheathing, or yellow metal, fit only for remanufacture, 1½ cents per pound.

163. Bronze powder, 15 cents per pound; bronze or Dutch-metal, in leaf, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

164. Bouillons, or cannetille, metal thread, filé or gespinst, and epaulets, galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, and wings of gold, silver, or other metal, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

165. Chromate of iron, or chromic ore, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the paragraphs relating to copper, and paragraphs 171, 172, and 173, respecting cutlery, may be passed over. I think the committee may have some amendments to offer to all of those paragraphs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraphs 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, and 173 will be informally passed over and not read, to be reverted to hereafter, at the request of the committee.

Mr. VANCE. I ask the same as to paragraph 163.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator from Iowa include paragraphs 173, 174, and 175?

Mr. ALLISON. I include copper and cutlery, down to paragraph 173.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Including paragraph 173?

Mr. ALLISON. Including that paragraph.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be resumed at paragraph 174.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

174. Gold-leaf, $2 per package of five hundred leaves.

Mr. VANCE. I ask that that may be reserved. I have something to say upon that which I shall not undertake to say this evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraph 174 will be passed over informally.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Iowa if it will be agreeable to him to have a short executive session at this time?

Mr. ALLISON. I proposed to move an adjournment at half past 5. If the Senator wants an executive session I shall not object.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 19, 1888, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate the 18th day of December, 1888.

DISTRICT JUDGE.

John E. Hartridge, of Jacksonville, Fla., to be United States district judge for the northern district of Florida, vice Thomas Settle, deceased.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 18, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONTINGENT FUND, ETC., STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting statements of expenditures from the contingent fund of the State Department, from the contingent fund for foreign intercourse, and of certain disbursements for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

PUBLICATION OF CONSULAR REPORT OF J. SCHOENHOF.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting an estimate and recommending an appropriation for the publication of the report of Mr. J. Schoenhof, United States consul at Tunstall, England; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN BAND OF CHEROKEES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation for legal proceedings in behalf of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians in North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation to pay the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions for improvements on the Indian school buildings at Albuquerque, N. Mex.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHAPEL AND GYMNASIUM AT INDIAN SCHOOL, LAWRENCE, KANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior for the construction of a chapel and gymnasium at the Indian school, Lawrence, Kans.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC WORKS, WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional estimates from the Secretary of War of appropriations for certain public works and objects under the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL MUSEUM.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in further response to the House, a supplementary report of articles suitable for the proposed military and naval museum; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EMPLOYÉS IN WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of employés in that Department, and stating that they have been usefully employed, and that their services can not be dispensed with; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does that refer to the clerical force of the War Department?

The SPEAKER. It does.

CONTRACTS BY WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the War Department for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGES, ETC., SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, submitting a list of expenditures for international exchanges for the National Museum and for North American ethnology for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADDITIONAL BUILDINGS AT FORT LEAVENWORTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War for additional buildings at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, the communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate for additional buildings at Fort Leavenworth, it strikes me should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and not to the Committee on Appropriations, as has just been ordered by the Speaker. It is included in the Army appropriation bill——

The SPEAKER. The appropriations for the construction of buildings have always heretofore gone to the sundry civil bill, the Chair thinks. While the Committee on Military Affairs makes appropriations for the military department of the Government, these appropriations have always been made through the other bill.

Mr. RYAN. The Chair is correct in that statement.

Mr. RANDALL. Regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But this is a new building. The Committee on Appropriations have nothing in the world to do with it.

The SPEAKER. Such propositions have always been reported heretofore in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an established post, and it is not for the establishment of any new post.

The SPEAKER. It is for a work already in progress.

Mr. RANDALL. And belongs to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RYAN. This is simply for the enlargement of a post, and the reference made by the Chair is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no particular desire that it shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, although it seems to be a subject properly to be submitted to that committee. However, I shall make no point upon the question.

JOHN C. POWERS VS. UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of the court dismissing the case of John C. Powers vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LIST OF DISMISSED CASES, COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of cases dismissed by the court in accordance with the provisions of the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAREPTA C. LITTLE AND WILLIAM A. THORNTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, reporting the dismissal by the court of the cases of Sarepta C. Little vs. The United States, and William A. Thornton vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL H. DUNSCOMB.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of court dismissing the case of Samuel H. Dunscomb and others vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ELIAS SNIVELY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the order of court in the case of Elias Snively's administrators vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] requests that the bill (H. R. 11580) for the relief of Julia A. Nutt, widow and executrix of Haller Nutt, deceased, be taken from the Private Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on War Claims. If there be no objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILLIAMS indefinitely, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. JACKSON asks unanimous consent to print remarks as of this day upon the bill making provision for the French spoliation claims, being his remarks, revised and extended, made in the House August 9 last, and withheld for revision. If there be no objection, leave will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. If there be no objection——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] demands the regular order.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged report from a committee of conference which I desire to present.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask as a favor that the gentleman from Arkansas withhold that.

Mr. PEEL. Very well. It can come in right immediately after the bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desires to call up.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to announce to the House that I will not ask consideration of the Territorial bills to-day. To-morrow we will have a meeting of the Committee on Territories, and, after that, we will announce when we will take up those bills for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. STEELE. The regular order will be found on the Calendar, page 94.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make the motion before we come to the Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that the special order be passed over until this bill shall be disposed of, and that it shall come in after the report of the conference committee shall be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to reach is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. STEELE. I am aware of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks that this special order may be postponed until after the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. What is his bill?

The SPEAKER. A bill increasing the pension to Mrs. Elizabeth G. Scott, widow of General Scott. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object, in the interest of the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is the regular order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Well, let the fight come now.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. STEELE. I do not want to antagonize the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] now calls the bill up and the question of consideration is raised against it, and the House determines not to consider it at this time, it will not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I do not desire to antagonize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on taking up the bill of the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the House decided not to take up the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to dispense with the first morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to dispense with the calling of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to dispense with the next morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is not necessary, and can not be done except by unanimous consent; but under the rules of the House, when the first morning hour has been dispensed with, it is in order to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that I ask consent that gentlemen having reports from committees to make may be allowed to file them with the Clerk.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORTS FILED.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

MRS. HARRIET H. ROBINSON.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 416) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet H. Robinson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGE M'DOUGALL, DECEASED.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL also, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the legal representatives of George McDougall, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY B. DAVIDSON.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11751) to remove the political disabilities of Henry B. Davidson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. H. ROCHELLE.

Mr. CULBERSON also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11762) to remove the political disabilities of J. H. Rochelle; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

POWERS OF DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11793) to abolish circuit-court powers of certain district courts of the United States, and to provide for writs of error in capital cases, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADDITIONAL LAND OFFICES IN COLORADO.

Mr. TURNER, of Kansas, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3124) creating three additional land offices in the State of Colorado; which was committed to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN RANDOLPH COUNTY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. PAYSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably a bill (S. 259) granting the title of the United States to certain lands to the county of Randolph and State of Illinois on certain conditions; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LAND IN THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11634) to provide for allotment of land in severalty to United Peorias and Miamies in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN DONALDSON.

Mr. LANHAM, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 1155) for the relief of John Donaldson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably House concurrent resolution to print 10,000 copies of the third annual report of the Commissioner of Labor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REFUGE STATIONS, ARCTIC OCEAN.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (H. R. 11852) to establish two refuge stations on the coast of the Arctic Ocean; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, will it be competent for me thereafter to raise the question of consideration against the legislative bill in favor of the river and harbor bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, under the rules of the House, after the hour has been consumed in the call of the committees for reports, or after that hour has been dispensed with by a vote of the House, it is in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider general appropriation bills or revenue bills. It would not be in order for the gentleman from Louisiana to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the river and harbor bill until after the hour for the consideration of bills has been occupied; so that in the present condition of affairs, for the gentleman to get at the river and harbor bill, his plan is simply to resist going into Committee of the Whole on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. BLANCHARD. The only way, then, of reaching the river and harbor bill to-day is to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is that the way?

The SPEAKER. If that motion is rejected then the hour for the consideration of bills would follow, and after that the gentleman could make his motion.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the House will vote down the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the House will not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable, and the regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not propose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by several gentlemen.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The question was taken, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11795) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 50, 1890, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with and that the Clerk proceed to read it by paragraphs.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk, reading the bill by paragraphs, read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, $3,000; assistant clerk, $1,600; messenger, $1,000; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk, $1,600; messenger, $1,000; clerk to Committee on Agriculture, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the District of Columbia, clerk to the Committee on Elections, clerk to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, clerk to the Committee on the Public Lands, clerk to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, clerk to the Committee on War Claims; clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of March 7, 1888; clerk to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and clerk to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, at $2,000 each; for assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,200; in all, $51,400.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to offer an amendment to correct the total at the end of that paragraph. I move to strike out the words "fifty-four" and insert in lieu thereof the words "forty-six."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,500; and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary; assistant doorkeeper, superintendent of document-room, assistant superintendent of document-room, and Department messenger, at $2,000 each; one employé, $1,500; document file clerk, $1,400; assistant document file clerk, $1,314; clerk for Doorkeeper, and janitor, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, including the messenger to the Reporters' Gallery, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, at $1,000 each; six laborers, at $720 each; two laborers in the water-closet, at $720 each; three laborers, including two in the cloak-rooms, at $600 each; female attendant in ladies' retiring-room, $600; superintendent of the folding-room, $2,000; three clerks in the folding-room, one at $1,800 and two at $1,200 each; one foreman, $1,500; one messenger, $1,200; one folder in the sealing-room, $1,200; one page, $500; one laborer, $400; ten folders, at $900 each; five folders, at $840 each; three folders, during the session, at $70 per month each, $1,470; and fifteen folders, at $720 each; one night watchman, $900; one driver, $600; fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; two chief pages, at $900 each; thirty-three pages, boys not under twelve years of age, during the session, including two riding pages, one telephone page, and one telegraph page, at $2.50 per day each, $17,490; two messengers, during the session, at $70 per month each, $980; ten laborers, during the session, at $60 per month each, $4,200; six laborers, known as cloak-room men, during the session, at $50 per month each, $2,100; in all, $128,014.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph. On page 14, line 14, I move to strike out "nine" and insert "three," making the number of messengers on that roll three. Also, in line 9, page 15, I move to strike out "fourteen" and insert "twenty." This amendment will make the number of messengers on the soldiers' roll twenty. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years I have thought that it would be very proper for the House to increase somewhat the number of messengers on the soldiers' roll, and yet it is quite obvious that the aggregate number of messengers in the employ of the House ought not to be increased.

The nine messengers provided for in line 14, page 14, are receiving $1,200 each, and the messengers on the soldiers' roll receive the same compensation; so that the effect of my proposition is simply to reduce by six the number of messengers who are not on the soldiers' roll, and therefore not entitled to the same degree of consideration as the disabled soldiers, and to increase the number on the soldiers' roll to the same extent. I have called this matter to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations on different occasions, but up to this time no motion has been made in the House upon it of recent years, and I trust there will not be any objection to the proposition. There are no men who are so much entitled to consideration as employés of this House, or of this Government, as the disabled Union soldiers, and I think that to increase that roll to the extent I have proposed is an entirely proper thing for this House to do. Those now on the roll are all competent, worthy, and efficient, and fill their places well.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am not authorized by the committee to accept this amendment, but it is only fair that I should state its effect. It does not increase the number of the officials of this House. It simply transfers a certain number of men from what I may term the political danger-roll [laughter] to a securer place on the soldiers' roll, where the statute applies which provides that employés on that roll shall not be discharged except for cause reported to the House and approved by the House. For myself, individually, I have no objection to the amendment, but I can not say that the committee favors it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I was sitting back in the Hall when my friend from Indiana explained his proposition, and, not being a member of the subcommittee who prepared this bill, nor seeing any of the members of that committee present, I will ask the gentleman to state his amendment again so that the House may clearly understand its effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. My proposition is this: In line 14, page 14, the number of messengers provided for is nine. I propose to reduce that number to three, and then, in line 9, page 15, striking out "fourteen" and inserting "twenty." The effect is to increase the number of messengers on the soldiers' roll by six, at the same time diminishing the number on the ordinary messengers' roll in the same degree. The men on both rolls receive the same compensation.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What will be the effect of the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. The effect will be to increase the number of disabled soldiers in the employ of the House. It will have no other effect.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Are the other messengers who are now employed, soldiers?

Mr. HOLMAN. All of the fourteen on the soldiers' roll are disabled soldiers, but the nine are not.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Your purpose, then, is to increase the number on the soldiers' roll?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes. One reason why I may be excused in making this motion is that in the year 1867, I think, I had the honor to submit a resolution to the House which resulted in the establishment of this soldiers' roll, and I have always thought and suggested that it might be very properly increased without doing any possible injustice to the gentleman having the responsible duties of Doorkeeper. I trust, therefore, that there will be no objection to this proposed increase of the soldiers' roll.

Mr. CANNON. I do not exactly understand the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say to my friend from Illinois that my proposition is this——

Mr. CANNON. Let me say a word. This is a proposition to increase the soldiers' roll?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; to increase it by the addition of six.

Mr. CANNON. I have noticed, if the gentleman will allow me to say it, with all due respect to him, that he made a somewhat similar proposition in the Forty-seventh Congress. That was a Congress in which I had something to do with the making of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. The proposition was not adopted at that time; the soldiers' roll remained then as it is now. We have had now the Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth Congress, and the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, in which the gentleman has assisted me, or rather I have assisted him, in making this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Forty-eighth and the Forty-ninth Congresses.

Mr. CANNON. And now, after those years have passed in which the gentleman had charge of this bill as chairman of the committee, he waits until the Democratic party has lost the House, and having let those splendid opportunities pass by, he comes in and proposes to increase this soldiers' roll. I think we had better let it remain as it is. We are taking care of the soldiers' roll. It is as it has been fixed for twelve or fifteen years——

Mr. HOLMAN. Twenty-one years, I think.

Mr. CANNON. And I can not assent to my friend's proposition without doing injustice to him, because if he really thought this ought to have been done, surely during the four years in which he had almost exclusive charge of this bill he would have placed this proposition upon the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] makes this matter very personal, as though there were no merit in it beyond mere personality. Let me suggest that when we are dealing with a question affecting the Union soldiers we can afford to overlook party considerations. I mentioned as one reason why I brought forward this proposition that this soldiers' roll, consisting of fourteen, was originally established some twenty-one years ago upon my motion. I have repeatedly since then sought to increase the number. The gentleman from Illinois may forget the fact that during the Forty-eighth or the Forty-ninth Congress—one or the other—I tried to obtain an increase; I do not say up to twenty, for I do not remember the number; but I tried to obtain an increase of the number on this soldiers' roll, and have done so from time to time. For a good many years I have felt that this roll should be moderately increased, while reducing the number of officers of the same grade receiving the same salary, but who are not disabled, thus leaving the public service perfectly efficient and without doing any possible injustice to the Doorkeeper of the House. Indeed, I would like to see the number increased beyond what I have mentioned. All these fourteen messengers now on the soldiers' roll are disabled soldiers; the law requires that such men shall be selected for these positions. But I submit to my friend that even the fact, if it exists, that any member proposes to perform a duty which he ought to have performed heretofore is no reason why, when it is presented, the duty should be postponed.

I am not proposing to increase or diminish the aggregate number of employés at all; my amendment will leave the number exactly as at present; its effect is to diminish the number of those who are not disabled soldiers and increase the number of those who are. In the vicissitudes of politics in this country we can all, of course, anticipate changes in this House from time to time, and I would be very glad if my friend from Illinois would co-operate with me here to-day in securing this further recognition to a moderate extent of the claims of those men who have been permanently disabled in the public service.

Mr. CANNON. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, he will allow me to say that this appropriation runs for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress. Under the terms of this bill as reported the soldiers' roll will remain substantially as it has been for twenty years.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, and nearly all the members of it are members, I believe, of my friend's party—at least the greater number. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. If this bill be passed as reported, this roll will remain substantially as it has remained for twenty years, during most of which time my friend's party has been in power so far as this House is concerned. During the last four years—yes, nearly six years—the gentleman's party has been in power, and he has been in charge of this bill; yet no action has been had.

Mr. HOLMAN. I mentioned that I had failed to obtain heretofore the necessary action.

Mr. CANNON. Let me repeat to the gentleman that the cause of the soldier will be perfectly safe in the hands of the next House of Representatives; and I would rather——

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not perfectly safe in the hands of this House? Why is it not safe in the hands of this House of Representatives as well?

Mr. REED. I wish the gentleman from Indiana would explain why he selected this time to make this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already explained that this is not the first time I have sought the opportunity.

Mr. REED. When was the first time?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has mentioned the Forty-seventh Congress. I think it was also before that and after that.

Mr. REED. That was when we were to have the Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does that make any difference in regard to doing justice to the soldiers?

Mr. REED. But these are the times you select. The two times you select are when we are to have the Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman, then, does not want to increase the number of soldiers on the soldiers' roll?

Mr. REED. I want to know why the gentleman has selected these two times?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, there is no trouble about this proposition. The next House will be perfectly competent to choose its employés, and in doing so will do full justice to the soldiers of the late war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Maybe you will, and maybe you will not, but you have not done it heretofore. Why raise a petty political question over a matter of justice in reference to a small increase of the number of permanently disabled soldiers? What matters it what House fixes the number to go on this soldiers' roll?

Mr. REED. Why did the gentleman from Indiana select the Forty-seventh and Fifty-first Congresses for this patriotic effort?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does that make any difference, if the matter is right, what Congress it is proposed to be done in? If the measure is right, what difference is there when it is done?

Mr. REED. But why did you select the Forty-seventh and Fifty-first Congresses in which to do it?

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is whether the measure is a proper one, and whether it is right to do this thing. I think it is.

Mr. REED. But let us consider the matter in regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I again ask, if the matter is right and proper, what matters it whether it is done at this session of Congress or at another?

Mr. REED. But why did you not do it?

Mr. HOLMAN. You were under as much obligation to do it as I was. Why did you not do it?

Mr. REED. You are not answering my question. Perhaps you have overlooked the question. The gentleman from Indiana on mature reflection will not further press his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. On mature reflection I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman was so anxious that this should be done in the Forty-seventh and in the Fifty-first Congresses, why was he not equally anxious in the interval?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already stated the facts. There need be no equivocation about it. I do not claim any particular credit; under the rules of the House any member had the right to move an increase of the soldiers' roll. I make my motion now at the proper time. The only possible objection there can be made to it is some pretense of partisanship. Perhaps the gentleman can overlook that little matter of patronage. It is only justice to the disabled Union soldiers that it should be done.

Mr. REED. Does not the gentleman think it was unfortunate to select those two periods to make an increase?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, I do not think it is unfortunate. It was within the power of the gentleman to make the amendment at any other time if he thought it was necessary. I have made my motion at this time because I thought it was right and proper, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. How many soldiers are there to be benefited by this? Are any of these men to be benefited from Indiana? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. No, not that I am aware of. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Why, I understand every one of them is an Indianian. [Great laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. What does my friend mean? Does he mean that all these men are to be appointed from Indiana?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. So I understand.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is proposed to increase the number six at this time; that is, my amendment proposes to increase the number on the soldiers' roll by six, and they are to come from any State the appointing power may determine—they are to be disabled Union soldiers. Now, I wish to say there is a gallant Union soldier, who lost a leg on the field of battle, from my district, who is on the soldiers' roll and has been for many years, and I do not think there is any one here who will object to that.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish but a minute to speak on the merits of this question. In order that the House may understand it I will say that there have been for a great many years a number of employés upon what is called the soldiers' roll in the House. There are now fourteen messengers on that soldiers' roll at a salary of $1,200 each. They hold their positions by virtue of legislative provision—legislative designation of fourteen persons. Most of them have been here for a great many years, and most of them no doubt will remain on this roll until they die. Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] proposes to add to this roll, that is to the number of fourteen, six additional, who are to be appointed hereafter, making the number twenty. My own impression is that amendment may tend to break down the present roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. Right here just let me say to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CANNON. First hear what I have to say.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. CANNON. I decline to yield just now. Mr. Chairman, now these fourteen men who are upon the soldiers' roll, we all know them; we see them here, one-armed, one-legged, and I think one of them with no arms at all, old soldiers who have been here in the service of the House during all these years and are to remain here until they die. My own impression is that in justice to these fourteen old soldiers now upon the soldiers' roll we had better not by legislative provision increase that roll beyond the present number. Leaving this roll as it has been left under the Democratic House, I do not see why the gentleman from Indiana can not agree now to leave it to a Republican House. I think we can afford to leave it as he has left it. I think we can trust the incoming House of Representatives as to the appointments of the officers of the House other than these on the soldiers' roll so as to comply with the law; and the Republican doctrine that has always prevailed in this country is not yet changed, and never will be, that, other things being equal, it will always prefer the Union soldier who served in the late war for such appointments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to show the gentleman from Illinois how much more liberal and non-partisan this side of the House is in regard to this matter than he is. He has looked at it, I fear, from an entirely partisan standpoint.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I will show my friend the difference between the position he occupies in that regard and my own, by saying to him that if he will offer an amendment that this pending amendment of mine shall not take effect until after the organization of the Fifty-first Congress, I will cheerfully accept it.

Mr. CANNON. Why, this appropriation is made for the Fifty-first Congress, and it can not take effect before. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman thinks proper to offer that proposition, that it shall not take effect until the organization of that Congress, I shall accept it cheerfully. Let him understand at the same time that this amendment, if adopted, makes no change in the appropriation. The same sum is fixed in either event, whether it be adopted or not.

I am very sorry that my friend from Illinois has thought proper to give this a political significance.

Mr. REED. Oh, you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. The origin of this roll, the gentleman should bear in mind, was in a Republican House on motion of a Democrat; and the present roll, if I understand the matter correctly, has been composed largely of Republicans. Still my friend from Illinois and myself differed for years on a single point. I had sought to make the appointments permanent on that roll, but my efforts were unsuccessful until the Forty-eighth Congress, when the right to remove the appointees on this roll was revoked by law except by order of the House for cause. My friend from Illinois thought they should remain subject to removal like any of the other employés of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Why, the gentleman forgets. I co-operated with him in putting it through.

Mr. HOLMAN. When you had control of the legislative bill in the Forty-seventh Congress and I offered an amendment providing that the appointees on this soldiers' roll should not be subject to removal, the point of order was made against the amendment; and it was not until the Forty-eighth Congress, when I had control of this legislative bill, that it was made a permanent provision of law. The gentleman from Illinois, therefore, must bear in mind that even from his partisan standpoint he has not displayed as much anxiety or interest in this question as has been displayed on this side of the House.

Mr. REED. Well, if that was the object you had in stating this thing, suppose we go on with the bill now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. It was a Republican House which prevented the placing of that provision on the bill which was afterwards incorporated into a law by a Democratic House. That will be conceded; and in view of the fact that a majority of them are Republicans, and were at the time that I brought forward a provision to make it permanent, it will be conceded that there was an entire absence of partisanship displayed by the Democrats of the House in dealing with this subject.

I go further, Mr. Chairman, and say that if he is afraid his political friends will lose a little of the patronage by the adoption of this measure, I am willing to accept the amendment which I have suggested, that the appointments under this provision shall not take place until after the organization of the next Congress, when he and his political friends will have the making of the appointments.

Mr. BAYNE. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana if it would not be wise perhaps to let the Fifty-first Congress take care of its own organization, and not undertake to have it organized in advance by this House?

Mr. HOLMAN. We must provide now for the salaries of the officials of that Congress.

Mr. BAYNE. Of course you can provide the pay, but let that Congress attend to the business of fixing its own appointments.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the same provision as to amount is made whether this be adopted or not.

Mr. BAYNE. You just provide the pay, and that Congress will select its own officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Illinois, I repeat, thinks proper to amend this in exact harmony with the views he has expressed, to make the appointments operative only during the next session of Congress, when his party will have control of the House, I am perfectly willing to accept it. There is still no change in the law. The amount of the appropriation is the same; but the soldiers' roll is increased to the extent I have named.

I ask a vote upon the question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a word in reply to what the gentleman has said and the suggestion he has made as to an amendment to his motion. The appropriation is made by this bill for the Fifty-first Congress and does not take effect at all until after the Fiftieth Congress expires. Therefore the suggestion he makes as to these appointments, as he must know, amounts to nothing. The gentleman's motion and the speech which he makes, in the light of the facts, are so exceedingly thin, in my opinion, that they do not deceive anybody either in this House or in the country. The gentleman is not deceiving anybody by them but himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly they do not deceive anybody in the House or in the country. The gentleman is entirely correct. The House sees and the country will see exactly how it is.

Mr. REED. Well, will not the gentleman from Indiana admit that the gentleman from Illinois has succeeded in throwing a little light upon it so as to enable them to see what it is? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a proposition to increase the soldiers' roll largely in the interest of Republicans, and is a question so entirely devoid of partisanship that it will not escape the notice of the country.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I will remind my friend from Indiana of the old saying recorded in the Old Testament, that it is not every one who saith Lord, Lord, that shall enter into the kingdom.

Mr. MCMILLIN, Mr. WEAVER, and others. But that is in the New Testament. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Perhaps my friend from Illinois meant to draw a distinction between the old and new revision. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, to find that there are so many of my Democratic friends on the other side who appear to have read something of the Scriptures. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. But they do not seem to feel pretty sure about it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Let that be as it may, the gentleman from Indiana has been giving us mere lip service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 41, noes 72.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Before the Clerk proceeds to read, I move to strike out the last word. Can I have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana? I will not oppose an amendment if the gentleman will offer it that will add to the number, during the remainder of this Congress, of these men on the soldiers' roll, now when the gentleman's party is in power. If the gentleman desires this and will propose an amendment of that kind I will not object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is right during the present session of Congress it is right for the future, and I propose that his Doorkeeper in the next Congress shall have these appointments if they are made. It is entirely competent with him.

The Clerk read as follows:

For three commissioners, at $3,500 each; one chief examiner, $3,000; one secretary, $2,000; one clerk of class 4, who shall be a stenographer; two clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; one clerk of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and one laborer; in all, $29,800.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer the following amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, line 16, strike out "one clerk" and insert "two clerks;" in line 17 strike out "two" where it first occurs and insert "three;" strike out "two" where it last occurs in said line and insert "three." In line 18 strike out "one clerk" and insert "two clerks."

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. This is for clerks in the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not think it is subject to the point of order. We have a right to legislate as to the number of clerks. The law does not fix the number of clerks the Civil Service Commission shall have.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The last appropriation bill fixed the number that shall be employed, and any provision for a larger force will be a change of the law, because the law does not authorize it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the point of order is well taken on that proposition.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It will not be insisted by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Chairman, that under existing law any officer of the Government can employ an additional clerk there. That will not be insisted upon seriously. Now, if he seeks to give them employment and is to get any authority for the employment he gets it through an appropriation bill. And inasmuch as they can not be employed now, I think the point of order is well taken that any proposition to authorize their appointment will be a change of existing law.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. As I stated before, there is no law now except the last appropriation bill that fixes the number of clerks for the Civil Service Commission. The commission have strongly urged this increase, in order to make their work efficient; and we have a perfect right under this bill to give the clerical force needed in these different bureaus and Departments where the law does not now specifically and explicitly fix the number that are to be employed. I say that that point of order can not properly be made against this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend from Iowa will examine the bill organizing the Civil Service Commission he will find that the law fixes not only the number of the commission, but of all the employés. That is the only law there has been upon the subject fixing the number of clerks, as well as the number of other employés under the commission—so many clerks, messengers, and so on—and fixing their salaries. Since that time, under appropriation bills, I know of no other legislation there has been increasing the number; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the proposition now submitted increases the number over the number specified in the law creating the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that inasmuch as there is no law increasing the number the point of order is sustained.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Chair will not rule until an opportunity shall be given to call the attention of the Chair to the law, and I will do so; and if the Chair did decide it, with all respect for the Chair, the Chair decided it without understanding what the law is, and the Chair is broad enough, if it is called to his attention, to decide according to the law.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND). The Chair decided that inasmuch as there seemed to be no such law authorizing this increase the point of order would be sustained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated that law from memory and may have made a mistake.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Chair will allow me a moment. This whole matter of increasing or decreasing the clerks in the various Departments and offices of the Government is regulated by the practice of the House under the direction of section 167 of the Revised Statutes. After creating the Departments, etc., it is as follows:

The annual salaries of clerks and employés in the Departments, whose compensation is not otherwise prescribed, shall be as follows:
First. To clerks of the fourth class, $1,800.
Second. To clerks of the third class, $1,600.
Third. To clerks of the second class, $1,400.
Fourth. To clerks of the first class, $1,200.
Fifth. To the women employed in duties of a clerical character, subordinate to those assigned to clerks of the first class, including copyists and counters, or temporarily employed to perform the duties of a clerk, $900.

Then it provides what the salaries of watchmen, messengers, and assistant messengers shall be.

Now, this section of the Revised Statutes does not fix the number of clerks, of messengers, of copyists, or of watchmen; it simply provides for the salaries of all the force that may be found necessary, in greater or less number, to be employed in the various Departments, bureaus, and offices of the Government. Subsequent sections of the Revised Statutes do create a Secretary of the Treasury, whose salary shall be so much, and only one; a Postmaster-General, whose salary shall be so much, and only one; and so with a great many of the officers all through the various Departments and bureaus, giving them an organization, with heads and assistants; for instance, the Attorney-General, with Assistant Attorneys-General, and so on, giving a complete roster. But when it comes to the mere clerical assistants in the Departments, to the mere watchmen, to the mere messengers, to the mere copyists, the number required necessarily varies from one year to another as the exigencies of the public service may vary. The law fixes the salaries of the clerks of the different classes, and the salaries of different classes of the employés, but it nowhere fixes the number; and always since the enactment of this statute, upon the consideration of appropriation bills, it has been held to be in order, according to the exigencies of the public service, in the sound discretion of Congress, under the operation of Rule XXI, to increase or diminish the number of watchmen, the number of messengers, the number of clerks, the number of any of the employés in the various Departments and offices of the Government. And, Mr. Chairman, that is this motion, to give three additional clerical assistants, namely, one of class 3, one of class 2, and one of class 1 in this particular office. Therefore I do not think it is subject to the point of order. A fair construction of the section of the statutes to which I have called the attention of the Chair, together with the uniform practice under this clause of the statute, the Chair can see at once from necessity makes this motion in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this point has been decided both ways; but in view of the fact that there is no other way of providing for the public service except in the manner proposed, the Chair will overrule the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment will not prevail. This bureau was formed originally with three commissioners and four clerks, at an aggregate expenditure of $17,300. They have gradually increased the expenditures, and now the commissioners are asking for next fiscal year an increase, including an increase of their own salaries, of nearly $10,000 over the current year, embracing as well an increase of five in the office force. There was an increase of three clerks given last year. The principle, and the policy as well, upon which this bill has been framed is not to increase salaries, or to increase the force in any case unless it is absolutely necessary for the transaction of the public business, and the majority of the committee saw no such necessity in this case. I hope, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will sustain the Committee on Appropriations and that this amendment will be voted down.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In the Book of Estimates, in a note on page 16, this statement is made in regard to this desired increase:

Without this enlargement the additional clerks estimated for are absolutely required for the proper performance of the work now imposed on the commission.

So that it is the judgment of the commission, submitted to the House through the proper channels, that this increase is absolutely necessary in order to discharge efficiently the duties imposed upon them by law. Now, if it be the intention of Congress to treat this Civil Service Commission as an instrument for the benefit of the public service, they should be given sufficient force to properly discharge their duties. If, on the other hand, it be the intention to cripple them, to starve them out and destroy their efficiency, then the denial of this necessary force is one of the ways of accomplishing that end. I submit that every one who favors a fair trial of the system should give heed to the recommendations of the commission; and here we have them squarely on the record appealing for this increase as absolutely necessary. I want to say another thing in regard to this subject: My own conviction is that the Civil Service Commission has been conducted in a way to, perhaps, give some little heed to the letter, but that the spirit of the law has been very much lost sight of.

I am satisfied that the verdict pronounced by the people of this country will give us a commission that will pay attention to the spirit as well as the letter of the law; and in the face of the political prospect now before the country, relying upon its verdict, I think that every one should give heed to that verdict and come to the support of this proposition which has met with so much favor among enlightened citizens. I sincerely hope that the majority of this House will not plant themselves against something that is recommended even by their own officers and their own administration.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman has criticised the Civil Service Commission for not discharging its duty, saying that while it may have observed the letter it has disregarded the spirit of the law. I would like to know wherein the members of that commission have failed to discharge their duty.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I stated that as my belief——

Mr. McMILLIN. Will you give us——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. And the question of the gentleman will not shake that belief. I think it is the belief of the country. I think the gentleman believes it.

Mr. McMILLIN. What I desire is to get the evidence on which you found your belief. A grave charge like that ought to be backed up by something more than merely an opinion.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Ah, my friend, it does not need any "backing up" before the American people; and it does not need any backing up to a thoroughbred Democrat like my friend from Tennessee. He knows it better than I know it and better than I can show it.

Mr. McMILLIN. What I want is a statement from the gentleman of the evidence on which he founds his charge.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I tell you furthermore that I am satisfied——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McMILLIN obtained the floor and said: Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] time enough to give us the grounds on which he makes his serious charge against the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly satisfied, as I believe every member of this House is, that in the selection of clerks under the civil-service law politics has absolutely dominated that selection.

Mr. McMILLIN. You believe it?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In the evidence given——

Mr. McMILLIN. What is your evidence?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Wait till I answer your question; you are so anxious to have an answer. In the evidence given by one bureau chief he stated, if my memory serves me right, that he had seen to it that 97 per cent. of the persons appointed in his office were Democrats; and I am well assured that Republicans who have passed the civil-service examination with a high record—higher than that of many Democrats who have been appointed—have utterly failed to obtain recognition under the administration of the law with the present commission. The matter has been so conducted almost from the beginning (but the conduct has grown stiffer and stiffer as time has advanced) that our Democratic friends who have been examined have found favor in some way in the selections made under the operation of this commission.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman claim that that was done by the Civil Service Commission, and that the law has been violated in their recommendations?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I am not familiar with the delicate machinery by which it is done.

Mr. McMILLIN. You are getting up here to enlighten the House and the country concerning that machinery——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman's impetuosity will not allow me to answer his polite questions.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have yielded to the gentleman time for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman knows perfectly well—he is well-enough equipped in public affairs to know—that in the consultations with bureau chiefs and the heads of the great Departments and others who are asking the recommendation of candidates for appointment it has happened in some mysterious way—I am not familiar with the proceeding—in some mysterious way they have always managed to pump out Democratic candidates and leave the Republican candidates without attention. I believe an investigation of the appointments will show that 90 per cent. of the appointments made under the civil-service law have been made from the Democratic ranks, while I can safely say that the examinations of Republican applicants for position have been at least as creditable as those of Democrats. I will not claim that they have been better, but I believe they have been equally good. And when we find that a bureau chief, ranking almost next next to a Cabinet officer, boasts in a statement under oath that 97 per cent. of the appointees under him have been Democrats, we know that some singular manipulation is going on in the application of this law.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now I will ask the gentleman from Iowa whether it is not the fact that the greatest percentage of partisan appointments ever made since the Civil Service Board was organized was in the Pension Office under Republican administration?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not believe anything of the kind.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, I give it to you as a fact.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Now you are making a statement; you do not even deny mine.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do state to you that your charge is false.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. What do you do with Commissioner Black's statement that 97 per cent. of the appointees under his administration had been Democrats?

Mr. McMILLIN. You have stated that the most partisan administration of the law that ever existed was under Democratic administration. I say that is not true; and I have instanced the case of the Pension Office.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I have given you the evidence under oath of one of your own bureau chiefs.

And you know, sir, if you are as familiar as I thought you were with administrative affairs, you know the great mass of appointments in the Pension Office were filled before the civil-service law went into operation. It has only had its full, sweeping, complete effect within a short time. And General Black has generously told the country that he made no bones of filling all the offices entirely from the Democratic party. He did not know any civil-service law.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not know how he did it. It is a system which you say on the other side is to be perpetuated.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You gentlemen on the other side know very well this law is a farce and a shame as it has been administered.

Mr. McMILLIN. You know that it has been better administered under this Administration than under any other.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, which has been ruled to be in order.

Mr. RANDALL. In relation to this appropriation, I am not willing to permit the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] to attribute the motive to those who reported this appropriation bill that it is their purpose to cripple the Civil Service Commission. If the question of the continuance of the Civil Service Commission was involved I might have something to say on that subject, because I have hesitated and have never fully agreed there should be fastened on the country a class of permanent office-holders akin to a civil pension-list. I have nevertheless faithfully made recommendations by my vote so as to give this law all the efficiency necessary for its execution.

Mr. Chairman, last year this House, controlled as it is now, increased the force in that commission by three officials. What is the question presented to-day? These gentlemen come in here and ask that their own salary shall be increased from $3,500 each to $5,000, and also for an additional force over that of last year of five. We take the position that the increase asked is not needed. I do not myself believe it to be necessary. If our friends on the other side of the House are so much enamored of this law they will be soon in control of both branches of Congress, as well as of the Executive, and they can if they choose make this civil-service law extend all over the country and embrace every official. I am waiting with a good deal of curiosity, as well as in the hope of some amusement, to see what their attitude will be in the next Congress when they come to show their extreme sincerity in this respect. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the whole section beginning with line 14, on page 20, and ending with line 2, on page 21. That is the whole section making an appropriation for the Civil Service Commission. I do this because it seems that every bill introduced into this Congress for the repeal of the civil-service act has been buried in committee. I see no other way to reach this act and to cripple the commission than by striking out this whole section.

I believe this commission to be undemocratic. I believe it favors certain voters of this country at the expense of other voters, and I know that if the rules of the Civil Service Commission were applied to the members of this House not seven-eighths of the members would ever reach the floor again. [Laughter.] Now, sir, believing this to be undemocratic, and believing that it is in violation of the fundamental principles of the Government, I move to strike out the whole section, and hope that it will be agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA. I believe the amendment moved by my colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS] is a very healthy one [laughter]; one in which seven-eighths of the people of the entire Republic sympathize, and one in which three-quarters of the gentlemen on the other side of the House in their hearts sympathize. [Laughter.] Yes, sir; three-quarters of the gentlemen on the other side of the House are honestly and sincerely, in my belief, hostile to the civil-service law. On this side, if you could poll them honestly, they would be unanimously against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAN. That is not so.

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, it is so; we would be unanimous, and the reason why we would be unanimous is because we should be acting in accordance with the feelings and wishes of the majority of the people of the country, and that is the reason why we would be unanimous.

We listen to the calls of the people and we obey them when they are made. And we are going to obey their order made on the 6th of November last like good Democrats and good citizens; but we will only allow your party to remain in control and have custody of affairs until 1892. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPINOLA. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. Did you not pledge yourselves in your national platforms in favor of civil service?

Mr. SPINOLA. We said an honest civil-service law was good. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. What is that?

Mr. SPINOLA. Well, I will explain to you what an honest civil-service law is from a Democratic standpoint. [Laughter and applause.] We learn what it was from the immortal Jefferson. When the applicant for office appears, inquiry is made to the effect, "Is he honest, is he capable, is he a friend to the Constitution?"

Mr. WASHINGTON. And a good Democrat.

Mr. SPINOLA. And that means he is a Democrat, of course. [Renewed laughter.] It is no use to ask a man if he is a good Democrat if he is in favor of the Constitution. It follows as a matter of course. [Renewed laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, that is where the civil-service qualifications of a gentleman who comes here and asks for employment should be found and determined; and those were the civil-service ideas of the man who gave us our name, who created us as an organization, and whose principles we have sought to follow from that day to this, whose doctrines we will never abandon as long as the sun shines or the water flows. [Great applause.] That is the civil service that he taught us, sir—"Is the candidate honest; is he capable?" Those were the only requirements. If, then, he is a man who is deserving, his employer should be the sole judge of it. When I make application for admission as an employé in one of the Departments here, the head of the Department is the man to inquire into my qualifications and honesty.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SPINOLA. Most assuredly. I could not refuse anything to my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to ask my friend from New York whether his clarion voice rang out in behalf of the position and the principles he is now enunciating in 1884?

Mr. SPINOLA. I never in my life have advocated or favored civil service. [Laughter.] And what is more, that ancient and powerful organization who sent me here as one of their representatives has time after time by resolution denounced the law; and so long as that position is held by them, I, as an humble member of Tammany Hall, shall stand forth always opposed to anything of this sort. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Perhaps the gentleman did not apprehend the scope of my inquiry. Let me put it in another form. Did he in 1884 protest against the statements expressed in the letter of one Grover Cleveland to one George William Curtis?

Mr. SPINOLA. One Grover Cleveland addressed a letter to one George William Curtis, and the organization known as Tammany Hall passed resolutions against civil service. [Laughter and applause.]

That is the answer I make to the gentleman; and let me inquire of my friend and of his associates on the other side of the House, how do you stand with Senator INGALLS'S idea of civil service? He says he is a very wicked man, a wicked Republican, because he is opposed to civil service, and is in favor of wiping it out root and branch, as you gentlemen are if you spoke honestly and candidly your feelings publicly as you do in private conversation. [Renewed laughter.] The time is coming soon when it will be torn up root and branch and disposed of by the people of this country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the first question is on the motion to amend before the motion to strike out is submitted. It is proper that we should first perfect the text of the section before a motion is permitted to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND in the chair). The Chair was just about to state that the first question would be on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to amend the text and perfect the section.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 27, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw the amendment. This bill makes appropriation in pursuance of law which can not be changed in the manner suggested. The bill, as I have said, makes appropriations in obedience to law, and we certainly ought to live up to the law as long as it is upon the statute-book. If the gentleman wants the civil-service law repealed he should bring in a proposition in proper form.

While I have been opposed to fastening upon this country a privileged class of officials, yet this law is now upon the statute-books, and I want fairly and fully to execute the law as I find it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would gladly withdraw the amendment if I saw any other way of reaching the Civil Service Commission. Bill after bill has been introduced into the House with the view of abolishing the commission, and these bills have been referred to committees and there buried. I understand that a similar appropriation was refused to the Hayes civil-service commission, and that afterwards the commission was wiped out.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman is a little mistaken in that. I think it was during General Grant's term, and that the legislation to which he refers was enacted upon the motion of Hon. Benjamin F. Butler.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, I accept the correction. It was Grant then—Grant, who was a little better than Hayes, because Grant was President and Hayes never was. [Laughter.]

I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have no wish to obstruct the passage of the bill, and if he will agree to take a yea-and-nay vote upon the proposition in open House I will withdraw it.

Mr. RANDALL. I can not agree to that, because I have no such instruction from the committee on this amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask unanimous consent for a yea-and-nay vote on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can not give unanimous consent for a vote in the House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I insist upon the amendment.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to call the attention of my friend from New York to the fact that if we should fail to make this appropriation it would not kill the Civil Service Commission, but might temporarily cripple their ability to discharge the duties involved by law. The salaries will go on. This is simply a bill making appropriations. They would still have the right to collect their salaries notwithstanding. Now, I am perfectly willing for one to have a vote in the House to determine whether or not the Civil Service Commission shall be abolished, and I am willing to stand up against the position taken by my honorable friend from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] and give him not only inward but outward testimony that I believe the Civil Service Commission has been fairly administered. But I am not going to discuss that now. I rise simply to call the attention of my honorable friend to the fact that it does not accomplish what I understand is his purpose to accomplish, that is, the wiping out of the Civil Service Commission. It simply interferes with the way in which they are to get their pay; what the gentleman proposes can be brought up in another way.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then it is the difference between killing a man and taking his leg off. As he can not be killed, I am satisfied with the leg. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am not willing by my silence to be classed among those who are in favor of a partisan civil service. At the last Presidential election there were about 11,000,000 votes cast for one candidate and the other. The plurality of the one is perhaps 100,000, the Democratic candidate having received five and one-half million votes. I do not believe that that election resulted in disfranchising the whole Democratic party. They are still citizens of the United States, pay their taxes, may be called upon to bear arms in support of the Government, share in its burdens and in its responsibilities; and I am not one of those, sir, who believes that they may not furnish their proportion of spittoon-cleaners, of floor-wipers, of Department messengers, and Department clerks, their fair proportion of the machinery by which the Government is conducted.

If the election has established a principle in politics every man who is opposed to the execution of that principle in all fairness has been ostracized by the vote. He ought not to be permitted to participate in the Government—I mean in any official relation to the Government—or take part in shaping the policy of the Government if one has been indorsed by the election. That policy ought to be carried out as a policy that has been indorsed by the majority of the American people. But the man that writes at the clerk's desk, the thousands of women who are employed in the Departments, have no more to do with shaping the policy of the administration than the boy who follows the plow in yonder field, than the man who works about furnaces, in the shops, or the mills. They have nothing to do with it; and it is unfair, it is un-American, it is bad policy to assume that one-half of the American people, bearing the responsibilities and burdens of American citizenship, shall not be permitted to enjoy some of the emoluments of the small offices that may be in the gift of the President or of the party in power.

Why, sir, if we establish the policy of Tammany Hall what is the result? Our elections become a mere scramble for spoils. It is a mere question as to who shall hold the offices, who shall be the collectors, the postmasters, and clerks. American politics degenerates into a scramble for spoils; and then, if there be corruption to-day in our politics—and I regret to say there is—it is because of this infamous greed for the emoluments of office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to have two minutes more.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move that the gentleman have five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What are our politics and what are they becoming to be? We have an exhibition of it at every session of our American Congress. In the first place we multiply the offices. Why? That we may give places to our henchmen and that we may provide some easy position for our aunts, our brothers-in-law, or our cousins. Having increased the number of offices we soon proceed to increase the emoluments of each. There is no public demand for either, and neither increases the efficiency of the service. Offices are created for which there is no necessity.

Why, a number of years ago—I will not say when it was, but it was since I have been attempting to represent a constituency upon this floor—I saw two doorkeepers keeping a single door, each having a string tied to the knob, each sitting on an easy-chair reading a newspaper and smoking a cigar. When a Representative approached the door there was a pull of the string and he passed through, and then there was a relaxation of the elbow and the door was shut again, and each of those men was receiving $100 a month. Why, Mr. Chairman, everybody here knows we could abolish half the places in connection with this House and with the Departments of the Government and have a more efficient public service than we now have. Why is it not done? It is because we can not bear to remove our friends from those places. We do not dare to do it; we have not the courage to do it. I believe in conducting the Government on business principles. Why should we employ more persons to do a certain service than an individual or a private corporation would employ? Why do we not select men because of their efficiency, as you would select them in your private interest? Why do we not do it? Can the gentleman answer that question? It is because one is business and the other is politics. That is the reason. I am in favor of civil-service reform, if you please to call it by that name. I am in favor of a non-partisan civil service; I am in favor of applying the Jeffersonian test, Is the man honest, is he capable? But I would not put the further question as to which of the two political parties the man belongs.

Mr. CUMMINGS. "Is he forty-five years old?" That is the question they put.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I am not defending the civil-service machinery. I am not defending the details of the civil-service rules. I am attempting to get American politics above Tammany politics, New York politics, machine politics, partisan politics if you please, and to get the Government administered on true business principles, and I indorse everything that President Cleveland has so well said on this subject and condemn everything that he and his party have done in assuming to execute the civil-service law. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very glad to hear the distinguished gentleman from Indiana commending the civil-service law and giving assurance (as he can probably give such assurance better than any other gentleman on this floor because of his being personally and geographically so near to the President-elect) that during the incoming Administration an effort, at least, will be made to observe the principles of the civil-service law. We have heard much in the newspapers since the election about the "clean sweep" that is to take place immediately on the inauguration of the incoming President.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Where did you hear it?

Mr. SPRINGER. I read about it in the newspapers and I hear of it on every hand.

Mr. STRUBLE. Did you hear it from Indianapolis?

Mr. SPRINGER. And if the incoming Administration does not gratify the thousands of hungry applicants for office that will be upon it after the 4th of March by making that "clean sweep" it will certainly bring disappointment to those who are now waiting in such anxious expectancy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman knows how it is himself.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I want to say to gentlemen on the other side of the House that during the four years—and it will be only four years [laughter and jeers on the Republican side]—I want to say to them that if during those four years that they will occupy the offices and administer the Government they will administer the civil-service law in the same spirit of fairness that this Administration has administered it the country will have no reason to complain of them. [Jeers on the Republican side.]

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I can assure the gentleman that it will not be administered in the same spirit.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I do not suppose it will. I never thought it would be. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I want to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to the fact that after four years of Democratic administration there are twenty thousand persons on the Government pay-rolls to-day in the city of Washington, of whom not over two thousand are adherents of the Democratic party. [Laughter and cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the Republican side.]

A MEMBER. There was more than that number when the Democrats came in.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; not at all. I deny that, and I appeal to the records. If you go to the Departments to-day you will find many rooms without a single Democrat; and if you had been in the Departments immediately after the late election, you would have seen many of the clerks who have been holding office during these four years under a Democratic administration, promenading the halls rejoicing over the election of a Republican President.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. You will find a good many of them that can change as quickly as any administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. If what the gentleman states is a fact, if that was all they could provide for their friends, it is no wonder that the Democratic party was turned out of power.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Democratic party has endeavored to carry out the civil-service law in good faith. [Jeers and cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the Republican side.] And if the gentlemen on the other side will do half as well during the four years that they are to administer the Government the country will have nothing to complain of. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another fact, and that is that this Administration has not been repudiated by the American people. [Ironical cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.] If you look at the election returns you will see that Mr. Cleveland received 5,538,000 votes, while Mr. Harrison received 170,000 votes less. In other words, there were 170,000 more votes cast by the American people for the Democratic candidate than were cast for the Republican candidate, and if it were not for the cumbersome and obsolete machinery known as the Electoral College, if the American people could have approached the ballot-boxes and voted directly for their choice for President, we on this side of the House would now be rejoicing over a great Democratic victory. [Jeers on the Republican side.]

Mr. JACKSON. You mean that you could have reached that result by suppressing, in one-third of the country, the vote against you.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I hope my friend will keep quiet.

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; and on that subject you would like the country to keep quiet.

Mr. SPRINGER. I should think the facts would worry the gentleman, and I am not surprised that he moves uneasily while facts of this character are brought to the attention of the country; but I hope he will endeavor to possess his soul in patience. I want to call attention further to the fact that upon the principles that were submitted to the people in the last election a large majority of the American people decided in favor of the Democratic party. Of the white voters of the country, who are supposed to be most informed upon public matters, a majority of more than a million have decided in favor of the platform and the principles and the candidate of the Democratic party. [Laughter and jeers on the Republican side.] So that the election is not a defeat of the Democratic party. It is simply a turning over for a brief period, by the machinery of the Electoral College, the administration of the Government to the Republican party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the popular vote received by Mr. Cleveland with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. When I think of the opportunities which his party had for increasing their pluralities in certain of the States I should expect them to feel as Lord Clive felt with regard to his Indian administration—"astounded at their own moderation." [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. We do not vote them "in blocks of five," though.

Mr. LODGE. The point that I desire to say a word upon is the motion to strike out the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission. If it is desired to destroy that commission, the honest and the manly way to do it is to bring in a bill to repeal the law. If, as the representatives of Tammany say, every member on that side of the House is opposed to the Civil Service Commission, why do they not bring in a bill to repeal the law and take a square yea-and-nay vote upon it in this House? I will tell them why. It is because they know very well that the people of the United States would not approve of any such proposition. What is called civil-service reform is simply a name for what is desired by the people of this country, and that is to take the great mass of the routine offices out of politics. Whether you do it by examinations, or by drawing lots, or some other mechanical device, is wholly unimportant. The thing is to get rid of this miserable spoils system in offices which are purely business offices. In that movement I firmly believe the great mass of the intelligent people of this country heartily concur.

Moreover, when gentlemen tell us that this is un-American, when they sneer at civil-service reform and say it is humbug and hypocrisy, and all that, I can only say that, to my mind, the un-American system of distributing public offices is that which relies on favoritism and nepotism and political pressure, and which does not honestly seek to devise some system which shall give a fair field and no favor to all the citizens of the country without regard to party. Favoritism is not American; open and fair competition is.

The offices which pertain to party administration, and are in their nature political, should be in the hands of party; I have no sentimental notions on that subject. But as to the great mass of our public officers—these clerks here in the Departments and in the custom-houses, many of them women—it is the idlest folly in the world to say that it is a business system or an American system to have them chosen by political pressure and personal favoritism, and all the other influences with which the country has been familiar.

How has this system affected you gentlemen during the last four years; how will it operate with us in the coming four years? Have we not, every one of us, groaned under the pressure to get offices? We all dislike it; there is not a man on this floor who does not. There is not a man or a party to whom patronage and its administration are not a source of weakness at the polls. It never strengthened any man. You had all the patronage in the last election; how much did it help you? We had all the patronage in the preceding election; how much did it help us? It never helped any man or any party, and the sooner some system can be devised—I care not what system it is—that will take these offices out of politics, the better for our elections, the better for our public men, the better for our politics, the better for good and honest government.

I only wished to say these few words, Mr. Chairman, because, however much I personally respect the gentlemen representing Tammany Hall who have addressed us, I object strongly to any one undertaking, in referring to this side, to represent my feelings as being other than they are. I am a thorough-going civil-service reformer, because civil-service reform is the name applied to the movement to take the routine offices of the Government out of politics. [Applause.]

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman, my position on this question has always been understood, I think, by every one who has known me, for I have never concealed my views here or elsewhere. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and upon the ground on which he puts it, because it is the only way in which I can practically carry out my opposition to the further continuance of the so-called Civil Service Commission.

But, Mr. Chairman, my object in rising now is to ask my Republican friends on the other side, who sneer so much at the administration of the civil service by a Democratic administration, whether their memories are so short as to have forgotten how that law was administered by Republican administrations, and whether they do not carry their minds back to the fact that it was the maladministration of the civil service of this Government by Republican administrations which brought about the passage of the civil-service law? Have they forgotten that the civil service of this Government had become so degraded that it was an actual stench in the nostrils of this country without regard to politics, and that it was this abuse of the civil administration of the Government which induced the Congress of the United States, Democrats and Republicans, to pass that law, in obedience to a sentiment which had grown to be a demand on the part of the people for a stoppage of the outrageous proceedings connected with the civil administration of this Government?

Have they forgotten that when that law passed its effect was actually to keep in position those Republicans who had been placed in the Departments simply and only because of the partisan service which they had rendered? That civil-service law did not begin, as it should have done, by a clean sweep or a retention of those only who could pass the civil-service examination; but as I said in a speech which I had the privilege of making once on this floor, the law, when liberally interpreted, meant simply that with the law and with the administration, the Republican party had the law and the offices, and with a Democratic administration we had the law without the offices—the inevitable result of a law passed as that was. But my friends should remember, while they charge this law has been administered by a Democratic administration in the interest of Democrats under the Democratic party it was most flagrantly administered by a Republican administration in favor of the Republican party. I undertake to declare that right here on this floor and to appeal to the truth of history of my own State to verify it. Under the execution of the civil-service law by the Republican administration not one single Democrat received an appointment in the custom-house or anywhere else within the State of Maryland during the entire incumbency of the Republican administration.

Gentlemen should remember, sir, that men are the same, be they Democrats or be they Republicans, and they will administer this law, or any other law, in the interest of their party. It is human nature.

I maintain here now that what the people of this country demand is this, an honest administration of the civil service with no paraphernalia attached to it which shall create in this country, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], a special, favored, privileged class. I repeat, I will oppose it, and so far as any opportunity or means are given to me to express that opposition, and by my vote, to destroy what I believe to be an undemocratic, an unrepublican, and an unconstitutional institution, I will vote against it here or anywhere else.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I merely wish to say that I should like to get a vote as soon as possible upon any amendment in order to proceed with the pending bill.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, the proposition is to strike out the clause in the pending appropriation bill appropriating about $35,000 to pay the salaries and expenses of Government officials appointed by the present Executive to carry out the civil-service law, which has been on the statute-book more than five years. When it passed this House Republicans voted for it and Democrats voted for it. It was a spectacle for gods and men to see the Democrats jumping and tumbling over Republicans in their eagerness to vote for this law. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, five years after it was passed what profits it the country that members come here and wrangle over the past records of parties in respect of this law, to be told that a certain administration has not done what it should have done in carrying out the law, or that one great party or the other has evaded its duty in executing the law?

Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that the law which has been criticised during this debate, the civil-service law, is one which has been approved both by the Republican and the Democratic parties in all their national platforms from 1876, as well as in their national platforms on which they fought the latest battle, and did not both parties pledge their faith to this law up to the recent election? Is it not true that the candidates for President, both on the Democratic and Republican sides, pledged themselves to support the civil-service law and this commission? Every candidate for Congress who was in a State where all the people are in the habit of voting took the earliest opportunity to declare himself to be in favor of it, or avoided saying, if he was not, that he was opposed to it.

I believe that law which Mr. Pendleton proposed in the Senate, which Garfield and Grant indorsed, which Arthur put into execution, should be honestly enforced, and I am in favor of enforcing it by voting the money to those who are to carry out its provisions.

We have seen in earlier days in our history this narrow, cowardly plan of nullification; we have seen it attempted, not to repeal a law, but to annul it by taking away the governmental powers necessary to the execution of the law. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] at least gains the level of public fairness when he says this law is upon the statute-book and the money should be given to enforce it as long as it remains there.

I believe the Republican party under President Arthur enforced the new law fairly and in good faith. We have all been learning something by experience in the last four years. If there be any place in which the spoils system has been carried out to a degree which may win the applause of the member from Tammany Hall [Mr. SPINOLA] it has been in the State of Indiana and in the State of Maryland. In the last election the State of Indiana voted for Harrison, the Republican candidate for the Presidency, who, as all admit, is a brave, true man, and who when he comes here will see to it that his promises and pledges shall be fully, completely, and bravely carried out; and in the State of Maryland, where the spoils system had full sway, there was a bare majority in favor of the Democratic candidate for President, while the Republican candidate received 4,000 votes more than Cleveland received four years before. Without patronage the Republicans gained 15,000 votes in four years, and by reason of the spoils the Democrats narrowly escaped defeat.

Mr. Chairman, I prefer to have, instead of the glittering corruption which the statesman from Tammany Hall offers us, the honest execution of the law which allows the poor and lowly, the humble man and the humble woman, to have equal opportunity to compete for clerical and other offices of minor importance in the great race for office in this country with those who are rich or who happen to be the favorites of great chieftains. I prefer a democracy, a government of the people, springing from the people, to the aristocracy which is proposed by these two gentlemen from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. SPINOLA] to be given to the nation as it is now bestowed upon New York City by Tammany Hall, where, out of a million and a half of people, it depends upon but two men to say who shall be the mayor and rulers of that great city. Sir, when we are confronted with the New York spoils method as compared with the civil-service system, and we ask, by the test the member from Tammany on this floor borrows from Jefferson, "Is the man just?" they point us to Barnard or Cardoza, and when we ask, "Is he honest?" they point us to William M. Tweed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, an assault upon the political methods in New York City comes with ill grace from a Republican Congressman from the State of Indiana. The people understand the Indiana idea of the spirit of civil-service reform. They have not forgotten that a Republican Vice-President, at a dinner in Delmonico's, at which the leaders of the Republican party were present, openly boasted of the use of "soap" in Indiana. They have not forgotten that one of the leaders of the Republican party to-day is regarded as a fugitive from justice in the State of Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Who is it?

Mr. CUMMINGS. New York political systems have never included the "five-block" business. New York political systems are based upon the will of the people, and the will of the people alone, and not on the use of millions of dollars in State and Presidential elections. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say just here that I want to concede the claim of those who have administered the civil-service law during the four years past of a disposition to fairly and honestly execute it. But gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber must remember that the execution of this law has been environed with difficulties and disappointments. Such has been the experience of the Democrats who have had the task of administering it. I am in favor of giving this appropriation and then permit the incomers to wrestle with the difficulties which the Democrats have encountered. They will, I believe, find troubles all along the road.

I think my friend from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] spoke in rather enthusiastic terms when he said that this side of the House was against executing the law, if I correctly understood his statement. I think this side of the House is very nearly unanimous in favor of executing the law, however much some may believe that some of its provisions and many of the regulations permitted under it should be modified.

I am glad to say that the present Chief Executive has removed from the minds of many one of the great obstacles to an approval of the law, and that is in regard to the change permitting persons to be examined who are over forty-five years of age. I wish he had gone a little further and permitted all of those who have exhibited capacity, above 66 average, to have their names reported for appointments, so that the choice should be made from the entire body of capables.

I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that appointments to office are hurtful to those members who have influence to secure them. There is hardly a man on this floor, who has had to do with political patronage, who has not realized the inconvenience, the ingratitude, and I might add some other equally applicable adjectives in that connection, from persons whom they have befriended. I hope my friend from New York will now withdraw the amendment, so that the law may be executed. And I ask, if no one desires to occupy the floor further, that debate be closed.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the attention of the committee but a moment. I do not know to what historical event the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] refers in speaking of the Vice-President and "soap." I do suppose, however, that I know to whom he alludes when he mentions by a kind of indirection that some distinguished Republican from Indiana is now a fugitive from justice. Allow me to say to that gentleman that the fugitive from justice is a Democratic United States district attorney, who having become cognizant of the fact that the evidence did not justify an indictment, has in disgust resigned his office. That fugitive from justice I give the gentleman bond now——

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I supposed I would succeed in bringing my distinguished friend to his feet. But the gentleman will have his own time when he wants to occupy it.

Mr. BYNUM. I supposed that the gentleman would refuse to yield.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. From the statements embodied in a newspaper report I learn that the grand jury of the United States court has failed to return any indictments, because of the acknowledged fact, admitted by the prosecuting officers and all others engaged in it, that the evidence did not justify it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will you explain, then, why the United States court allowed the grand jury to disband, and went off to Fort Wayne?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Because there was no evidence of a criminal act. I want to say that no person connected with the election in Indiana on the Republican side is afraid to put in his appearance at any time, and before any court.

Gentlemen need not be alarmed about it. I will go on the bond of any Republicans that may be indicted; and I say to the gentleman that while I do not believe Indiana methods have been altogether right in politics, if the Democratic party of Indiana want to open the books they shall be opened. We are ready. If they want to know how much money was used——

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. You burned the books, did you not?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If they want to know how much was used in the city of Indianapolis at the last election to suborn its votes and corrupt its politics, we are ready. If they want to know how many disreputable men were appointed in violation of the law as deputy United States marshals to intimidate Republican voters, we are ready. In my own town a deputy United States marshal was appointed who is the most notorious saloon-keeper in the place, while there were hundreds of reputable Democrats there. If they want to open the books, they can do so. If the gentleman from New York wants the books open, let it be done.

I am not saying that my party is pure. I am not attempting to defend it because the other is worse. I am only saying that if they want this investigated, in God's name let it be done, and if a Republican has violated the law let him be punished. "Let no guilty man escape." [Laughter and applause.]

A MEMBER. They have the power to investigate if they want to.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Now, I will say for one that Indiana politics are just as disreputable in some respects as Tammany and New York politics. [Laughter.] I say it regretfully.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You have more soap there than in New York.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes, sir. I want to say that in Indiana, within the last twelve months, we have sent two distinguished Democrats to the penitentiary, where they are now languishing because they violated the election laws. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have never heard of them doing that in New York.

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir; we do. A year ago three Republican supervisors of election were sent to the State prison, and they are there now. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to limit debate on this amendment to ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that debate on the pending amendment be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. SPINOLA. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move to make it twenty minutes—ten to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to limit debate upon the pending amendment to twenty minutes—ten on each side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question directly before the committee or to declare myself in favor of the civil-service law or opposed to it, but simply to answer the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] who has just taken his seat as to the reasons which caused the district attorney of Indiana, Mr. Sellers, to present his resignation. I desire to propound to the gentleman——

Several MEMBERS. Louder.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. BYNUM. It seems that my rising to address this House creates an uproar. I would like to make one little speech without having the rabble turned loose.

The gentleman from Indiana, my colleague, says that the district attorney resigned for the reason, as stated in the public press, that the evidence presented to the Federal grand jury was not sufficient to cause the indictment of Mr. Dudley. I undertake to say that the district attorney has made no such statement. No such reason is given to the public by him or by any one who is near to him. On the contrary, he has distinctly said, whenever questioned, that such was not the case. While this investigation was under consideration the district judge adjourned the court and discharged the grand jury until the 17th day of December, and for that reason probably to-day Mr. Dudley is breathing the fresh air in New York. He has not been in the State of Indiana since the letter was written, at least not since a warrant was issued for his arrest.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. The gentleman did not understand me to say that the district attorney had given that as his reason for resigning.

Mr. BYNUM. I did not say that the gentleman had said so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I say that the papers contain such statements.

Mr BYNUM. The Republican papers have published everything that was not true as to Indiana during the last six weeks and nothing that was true. [Laughter.] The district attorney had given charge of this matter to the deputy who has conducted the investigation before the jury, and who will continue it if permitted, as he has been nominated as successor to Mr. Sellers. I venture, however, to say that the Republican Senate will not confirm his nomination that he may pursue this investigation, but will reject his name in order to have some other man appointed who wants nothing done in the matter.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman state that Mr. Bailey is either honest or capable?

Mr. BYNUM. Both.

Mr. STEELE. When did you arrive at that conclusion?

Mr. BYNUM. I have never questioned his honesty or ability.

Mr. STEELE. You looked upon him as a pretty tough citizen?

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Bailey is a man of honesty and ability.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my colleague speaks of frauds in Indiana. Why, one of the leaders of his own party, at one time a law partner of President-elect Harrison (Mr. Fishback), charged publicly and openly that in 1880 Mr. Dorsey and Mr. Dudley dispensed in the Denison House parlors over $400,000 to corrupt the people of Indiana, and it has not been denied by any Republican.

Mr. DUNHAM. How much did the Democrats put out the same year?

Mr. BYNUM. So far as my personal knowledge goes they never put out a dollar—not a dollar. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] Now I want to say a word further. I am not here to charge that Indiana is more corrupt than any other State would be under similar circumstances. She has been a close State; she has held the balance of power and money has poured in from different sources. No doubt Democratic money has been sent in there, but never has there been a corruption of the votes of the State by the Democratic party or by funds contributed by that party such as there has been by the Republican party. We did not have the money. [Laughter.] More than that, I have insisted all along that no good could come from an investigation, because I did not think it would reflect any great credit on the State or of the managers of either party, but I will say to the gentleman that if he wants an investigation, so far as I am concerned I will cheerfully join him, and when he gets his investigators at work I hope they will investigate why it was that a district judge appointed seventy and odd United States commissioners the night before election who, on the day of election, when men were arrested and taken before them, refused to hear the cases of the offenders.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. BYNUM. Oh, you will answer. Well, I shall be glad to hear the answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It was because the ninth day before election you appointed marshals in every county in the State where there were Republican precincts, and those commissioners were appointed so that accused men might have a trial in their own counties and not be taken away to Indianapolis. That was the reason.

Mr. BYNUM. Yes; I know that marshals were appointed in conformity with the law, but not one-tenth as many as had been appointed under Republican administrations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYNUM. I would like a minute or two more. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that my colleague [Mr. BYNUM] be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. KERR. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes of my time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any way in which these gentlemen can be excused in order that they may go to the cloak-room and discuss post-mortem Indiana politics while the Congress of the country goes on with the business of the country? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that my time is extended?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has been limited to twenty minutes, ten minutes on each side, and the Chair is bound to apportion the time with fairness. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] is recognized.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. OWEN. We would like to have them extended on the floor—not in the RECORD.

Mr. BYNUM. Do I understand there is objection to my request?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. BYNUM. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OWEN] as objecting.

Mr. KERR. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his courtesy. I repeat that the district court on the night before the election appointed some seventy-odd commissioners—what for? Does the gentleman say, in order that parties might, when arrested, be taken before a commissioner in the county? I undertake to say that those commissioners refused to hear the cases, refused to take cognizance of them, and the marshals were compelled to discharge the parties without any hearing whatever. Parties who had been arrested charged with violation of the election laws were thus released.

Mr. STEELE rose.

Mr. BYNUM. I have no time to yield further.

Mr. STEELE. Every man gave his bond for appearance before he was discharged.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman wants to throw open the door, I can show him that there was corruption in Indiana; not only that money was used there to carry the election, but moreover that public franchises were sold in order to raise corruption funds to become a part of the campaign fund of the Republican party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in this connection only a few words bearing upon the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr SPRINGER]. I was surprised to hear a man so distinguished in this House speak of the Electoral College as an obsolete body. I think that if anything could emphasize the importance of this electoral system, founded by the fathers as a safeguard of our institutions, it is what has been developed in this debate. We are relieved in this particular case from the necessity of an investigation, because President Harrison has been elected irrespective of the vote of Indiana; so that need not distress us. But these statements go to show the importance of that time-honored system. The corruption, whatever it may have been, affects only the vote of a single State; and I say again, I was surprised to hear the gentleman from Illinois speak of the electoral system as an obsolete system.

We need not discuss the question whether a large portion of the Southern vote was suppressed, as intimated by my friend from Pennsylvania, because under the electoral system by which the executive branch of this Government has during our whole history been elected, the vote of the Electoral College determines the question, and it is in general immaterial whether the full vote, or only a partial vote of the State is polled; for, as we all know, only a certain number of electoral votes can be cast by the State; and it is immaterial whether all the voters go to the polls, or a portion of them remain at home, or whether or not a popular majority is cast for the candidates. I am glad our electoral system is maintained; and I do not think there is any danger that the American people will very soon consider this an obsolete system.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I used the word "obsolete" in speaking of the electoral-college system of electing President in the sense that the system was no longer administered in the spirit in which it was created by our fathers. As created and intended, the electors of President and Vice-President chosen at Presidential elections were presumed to be uncommitted as to their choice. But now, under the custom of party nominations, in advance of the election, the people vote directly for their choice, while that choice is limited and restrained by the machinery of the Electoral College. We ought to have in fact as in theory an election of President by direct vote of the people.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, there has been in this debate a good deal of crimination and recrimination in connection with what some gentleman on the other side has called a "post-mortem" inquiry into the recent election. I do not know that this debate is very pertinent to an appropriation for sustaining existing law, which our Committee on Appropriations is bound to report. But I beg to recall to the attention of the House the fact that up to the present time both parties in the United States have favored this system of civil-service reform—the Democratic party in its platforms, National and State; the Republican party in its platforms, National and State; and the candidates of these leading parties by their letters of acceptance. And no one, so far as I know, has yet proposed to repeal the existing law.

I am not partial to this law, for reasons which I once gave in this House. But I will recall to the recollection of members the fact that when Mr. Pendleton's bill for the reform of the civil service came from the Senate, the House was about taking up some shipping matters in which we from New York were interested; and inasmuch as I knew that the civil-service law would pass, and that in passing it would divide both parties, there being men on both sides opposed to it and men on both sides in favor of it, I proposed (and Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, accepted the suggestion) that we vote at once upon the passage of that civil-service bill. So on the tidal wave of an emotion here that measure was placed on the statute-book. By that proposition, as I said at the time, and as the RECORD shows, I wished to get that question out of the way for matters of more importance. But I have always voted for appropriations to sustain this law so long as it remains on our statute-book; and I think it comes almost with ill grace from any one just now to propose a repeal of the law, when Republicans have had the benefit of it and when Democrats have been kept out of office by reason of it; when, as a Republican administration is now coming into power, the Republicans who have been appointed will have the advantage of the law, while if the law should be repealed the Democrats will lose the benefit of it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that honesty is the best policy. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX. In the old Saxon deeds——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This does not repeal the law——

Mr. COX. It kills it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House will come to order.

Mr. COX. I have the floor. My colleague refers to the fact that honesty is the best policy. It used to be a badge of fraud for a man to write "honesty" in a deed too large. I do not believe in broadening our phylacteries. A great many men who profess to be so entirely honest should remember there are some quiet men who also are honest.

This Administration has not been satisfactory to everybody. Under Democratic administration there are complaints. I should like to show how our Democratic brethren executed it by reading from the statement made by Mr. Edgerton, the chief of the commission. He there shows how that law has been executed; and taking that statement I will vote for a repeal or modification of the law, but so long as the law remains I will endeavor to stand by the appropriation so the law may be carried out. I ask the Clerk to read what Mr. Edgerton says on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Baltimore Sun, December 3, 1888.]

"I think," said Judge Edgerton, "that Harrison will make a clean sweep of the commission. If he does not he will make a great mistake. The Civil-Service Commission is weaker now than it was two years ago. The policy pursued has brought the commission and its methods into disrepute, not only with the politicians, but with the general public as well. Wholesale examinations when the candidates have no chance whatever of securing an appointment do not win friends. Bushels of examination-papers are stowed away in the cemetery. That is the name we give the room where the papers of candidates whose names have been on the eligible register for a year are placed. No man or woman whose papers are in that room has a word of praise for the commission. I believe in only as many examinations as are absolutely needed. I would not allow the law to be only a delusion and a snare. I would have it so that those examined and passed as eligible would have a reasonable chance for appointment. These are things Mr. Harrison will have to look out for. The civil service needs careful pruning. The present method of executing the law would drag down any administration. The only safe way is to get rid of us all and start afresh. For my part, I have had no voice in the councils of the commission. I am not responsible for the present condition of affairs. Why, we have no money whatever for printing. The $5,000 allotted us for the year was exhausted last summer. We are getting along as best we can, but you can see we have to husband our blanks and to refrain from doing anything that will occasion a printer's bill."

During the reading of the foregoing extract Mr. COX's time expired.

Mr. COX. I hope there will be no objection to allowing the reading of that statement to be completed.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman be extended so the reading of that statement may be completed.

There was no objection, and the reading was then concluded.

Mr. COX. I will say in conclusion that I hope my colleague [Mr. CUMMINGS], who desires to get rid of this civil-service law, will bring in a bill and test the sense of the House on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that no expense of printing comes out of this appropriation. That comes out of the general fund for the Interior Department.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I should not speak at all on the pending question if it were not that a statement has been made which will go into the general history of the country charging that Col. W. W. Dudley was a fugitive from justice. I deny, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that he is or has been a fugitive from justice. In reply to the charge made I desire to state that he was for three and one-half years Commissioner of Pensions and moved his family to this city. Since his retirement from office he has resided here, so that he now is, and for nearly eight years has been, a resident of the District of Columbia, where, if he shall ever be guilty of violating any law of the United States, any process of the courts can reach him at his home as readily as it would if he was a citizen of Indiana and resided anywhere in that State.

So far as the election methods in Indiana are concerned, I desire to state as a native Hoosier and life-time Republican, familiar with the election methods of that State, on behalf of all the Republicans of Indiana, and also on behalf of my colleagues upon this floor as well as myself, that we court an investigation. We challenge gentlemen of the Democratic faith to open the books and institute a full, fair, and searching investigation of Indiana political methods. I say, Mr. Chairman, that if such an investigation shall be made it will not only inform the country of the use of money in that State, but the causes will be made apparent how and why, when the Republican Congressional majority in the State at the November election was nearly 5,000, only three Republican Congressmen were elected, while the Democrats, 5,000 in the minority, were able to return ten members to the Fifty-first Congress. For open and notorious violations of our election laws two prominent Democratic politicians are now in the State prison. Indiana Republicans have no cause to fear a searching investigation of election methods in that State.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, so far as the civil-service law is to-day a part of the statutes of the United States, the Civil Service Commission is a part of this Government. This commission was created and this law was passed by the concurrent action of both political parties. Both political parties in their platforms stand committed to its maintenance. Both political candidates in the late election were pledged to its enforcement. The Republican party, as a national party, stand pledged in good faith, and I trust they will maintain that good faith. If gentlemen on the other side of the House wish to go back on their platform and to repudiate the pledges of their candidates at the late election I cordially invite them to do so, but to do it in such manner the responsibility of their action can not be evaded.

Let it be done when there can be a yea-and-nay vote in the House and every member can be put upon the record. I do not think, sir, it is statesmanship nor that it is even decent politics to attempt to stab the civil service system by refusing this appropriation which will create a deficiency and in that manner retard its operations.

That is about all I desire to say. I trust that no gentleman on this side of the House will commit himself either by direction or indirection to the destruction of the usefulness of this commission, and especially that he will not do so by indirection. When the time comes that the American people desire a repeal of the law, let us introduce a bill for that purpose, and let the proper committee report it, and then after fair consideration, let the action upon it be recorded by a yea-and-nay vote, where each man can take his share of responsibility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 14, noes 97.

Mr. TAULBEE. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. TAULBEE. If there can be an arrangement by which we may have a yea-and-nay vote in the House, I will withdraw the demand.

Mr. RANDALL. The opinion of the House is quite manifest from the vote just taken, and I have no authority to make any arrangement such as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SPRINGER. We had a yea-and-nay vote at the polls in last November, and the people of this country have passed upon the question.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes; and we "got left" because of this very kind of foolishness.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. CUMMINGS and Mr. BUTTERWORTH were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 25, noes 138.

So the motion to strike out was rejected.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported to the House without recommendation.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no authority to agree to that [Cries of "Regular order!"]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers.

Also, that Mr. BLAIR and Mr. BATE had been appointed in place of Mr. SABIN and Mr. GEORGE managers at the conference on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture.

Also, that the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 337) granting a pension to Mary E. Johnston.

And further, that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3135) granting an increase of pension to Eliza J. Alexander, and agreed to the conference asked thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAWYER, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. TURPIE managers on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of stationery, printing, and blanks: For chief of division, $2,500; four clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; two assistant messengers; one foreman of bindery, at $5 per day; four binders, at $4 per day each; and one sewer and folder, at $2.50 per day; in all, $31,775.75.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend, in the nineteenth line, on page 27, by striking out the words "seventy-five" where they last occur and inserting "fifty."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase of horses and wagons, for office and mail service, to be used only for official purposes, care and subsistence of horses, including shoeing, and for wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, $4,000.

Mr. CLEMENTS. By instruction of the committee, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 44, line 19, strike out the words "and for wagons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Publication of Records of the Rebellion: For one agent, $2,000; three clerks of class 4, two of whom shall be employed on the general index; three clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 2; three clerks of class 1; three copyists, at $900 each; one pressman and compositor, $1,200; one compositor, $1,000; one copy-holder, at $900; two assistant messengers; two watchmen; and one laborer, at $660; in all, $26,480.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 70, line 10, strike out the words "one copy-holder, at $900," and insert in lieu thereof the words "two copy-holders, at $900 each;" and in line 12, strike out the words "twenty-six thousand four hundred and eighty dollars" and add "twenty-seven thousand three hundred and eighty dollars."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CRISP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same favorably to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the vote be taken on all of the amendments together.

There being no objection, the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were considered, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PEEL. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion for a moment to permit me to present a conference report.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

CIVILIZATION OF THE CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

Mr. PEEL. I present a conference report, which I desire to have considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

On page 2 of the amendment, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "ratified by Congress" and insert in lieu thereof "approved by the President of the United States."

On page 2 of the amendment, lines 22, 23, and 24, strike out the words "after said agreements of cession shall have been ratified by Congress, and not before."

On page 6 of the amendment, line 4, insert, after "feet," the words "board measure of the pine timber thereon."

On page 6 of the amendment, line 15, insert, after "feet," the words "board measure of the pine timber thereon."

S. W. PEEL,
TH. R. HUDD,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. DAWES,
F. B. STOCKBRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement of the managers on the part of the House of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7935) for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as to the effect of the amendment recommended for concurrence and adoption.

The Senate amendment, though in the form of a substitute, is in substance and form really the House bill, with merely the following amendments and changes:

Section 1 of the House bill requires that the agreements for cession and relinquishment shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior. By section 1 of the substitute, as modified by the agreement of the conferees, such approval is to be given by the President of the United States instead of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 2 of the substitute only differs from section 2 of the House bill in increasing the pay of the commissioners to negotiate the agreements, take the census, and make the allotments provided for in the bill from $5 to $10 per day.

Section 3 of the substitute and the House bill is the same in both.

Section 4 of the House bill provides for the appointment of three examiners to examine, estimate, and appraise the timber lands, while section 4 of the substitute provides that the examiners shall only examine and estimate, but the appraisal shall be made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. Such appraisal, however, shall not be at a rate less than $3 per thousand feet board measure.

Section 5 of the bill and the substitute is the same in both, except that the substitute provides for more extensive advertisement of the public sale of the timber lands, and also provides for private entry at not less than the appraised value of such pine lands as are not sold at the public sale.

Section 6 is the same in both the bill and the substitute, except that the substitute increases the price of the homestead land from $1 to $1.25 per acre.

Section 7 is the same in both the bill and substitute, except that the substitute increases the interest on the permanent fund from 3 to 5 per cent. per annum, conformable to the universal custom with regard to Indian trust funds.

Section 8, the last in both the bill and substitute, is the same in both.

S. W. PEEL,
TH. R. HUDD,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is a matter of a good deal of importance, and it had better go over until to-morrow. I now move the House adjourn.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that the report of the committee of conference and the statement of the managers on the part of the House be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not object to that.

Mr. PAYSON. And that they shall be accompanied by the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it is but fair to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who desires to report an appropriation bill, that I should withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the bill, the report of the committee of conference, and the statement of the managers on the part of the House be printed in the RECORD? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, within sixty days after the passage of this act, to designate and appoint three commissioners, one of whom shall be a citizen of Minnesota, whose duty it shall be, as soon as practicable after their appointment, to obtain and acquire for the United States of America, from all the different bands or tribes of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, their complete cession and relinquishment in writing of all their title and interest in and to all the Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota, except the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, and to all and so much of these two reservations as is not required to make and fill the allotments hereinafter specified, for the purposes and upon the terms hereinafter stated; and such cession and relinquishment shall be deemed sufficient as to each of said several reservations if made and assented to by two-thirds of the male adults of the band or tribe of Indians occupying and belonging to such reservations; and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proper number of Indians yield and give their assent as aforesaid, and for the purpose of making the allotments and payments hereinafter mentioned, the said commissioners shall, while engaged in securing such cession and relinquishment as aforesaid, and before completing the same, make an accurate census of each tribe or band, classifying them into male and female adults, and male and female minors; and the minors into those who are orphans and those who are not orphans, giving the exact numbers of each class, and making such census in duplicate lists, one of which shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, and the other with the official head of the band or tribe; and the acceptance and approval of such cession and relinquishment by the Secretary of the Interior shall be deemed full and ample proof of the assent of the Indians, and shall operate as a complete extinguishment of the Indian title, without any other or further act or ceremony whatsoever, for the purposes and upon the terms in this act provided.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, each give a bond to the United States in the sum of $10,000, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties under this act, and they shall also each take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to faithfully discharge the duties of their office, which bonds and oaths shall be filed with the Secretary of the Interior. Said commissioners shall be entitled to a compensation of $5 per day for each day actually employed in the discharge of their duties, and for their actual traveling expenses and board, not exceeding $3 per day. Said commissioners shall also be authorized to employ a competent interpreter while engaged in the performance of their duties, at a compensation and allowance to be fixed by them, not in excess of that allowed to each of them under this act.

SEC. 3. That as soon as the census has been taken, and the cession and relinquishment has been obtained and approved, as specified in section 1 of this act, all of said Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, except those on the Red Lake reservation, shall, under the direction of said commissioners, be removed to and take up their residence on the White Earth reservation, and thereupon there shall, as soon as practicable, under the direction of said commissioners, be allotted lands in severalty to the Red Lake Indians on Red Lake reservation, and to all the other of said Indians on White Earth reservation, as follows, heads of families and adults selecting for themselves, and the commissioners selecting for all minors: To each head of a family, male adult or orphan minor, 160 acres, and to all other persons, 80 acres each; and for the allotments so made as herein provided, certificates shall issue to the allottees, which certificates shall be of the legal effect, and declare on their face, that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted for the period of fifty years, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the allottee, or his or her heirs, according to the laws of the State of Minnesota, and that, at the expiration of said period, the United States will convey, by patent in fee-simple, to the allottee, or his or her heirs as aforesaid, the land so allotted, discharged of said trust and free of all liens or incumbrances, which patents shall accordingly issue; and as soon as such allotments have been made and certificates issued therefor, the said Indians to whom such allotments have been made shall be deemed to be full citizens of the United States, and entitled to all the rights¹ privileges, and immunities of such citizens, and shall have the benefit of, and be subject to, the laws, both civil and criminal, of the State of Minnesota; and all allotments heretofore made to any of said Indians on White Earth reservation are hereby ratified and confirmed with the like tenure and condition prescribed for all allotments under this act: Provided, however, That the amount heretofore allotted to any Indian on White Earth reservation shall be deducted from the amount of allotment to which he or she is entitled under this act: Provided further, That any of the Indians residing on any of said reservations may, in his discretion, take his allotment in severalty under this act on the reservation where he lives at the time of the removal herein provided for is effected, instead of being removed to and taking such allotment on White Earth reservation: Provided further, That no allotments in severalty shall be made and no sales of the land had under the provisions of this act until three-fourths of the male adults of the Indians interested shall consent thereto, and the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe rules and regulations by which said commissioners shall ascertain their wishes. And if the Indians residing on the White Earth reservation, including those removed thereto under provisions of this act, shall refuse to take land in severalty, then the said removed Indians shall be settled on said reservation in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall direct.

SEC. 4. That as soon as the cession and relinquishment of said Indian title has been obtained and approved as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all and so much of said reservations as are not fully surveyed to be surveyed as Government lands are surveyed; and in making such surveys the surveyors shall carefully ascertain and note and return on the plat and in the field-notes all 40-acre or lesser subdivisions on which there is any pine timber standing or growing, and which tracts are for the purposes of this act termed pine lands; and upon the completion of such surveys the Secretary of the Interior shall cause each 40-acre or lesser subdivision of such pine lands not allotted as hereinbefore provided to be appraised by three competent men, to be appointed by him, which appraisal shall in no event be less than $3 per acre; said appraisers shall also, in respect to all portions of said reservations which have heretofore been fully surveyed, and are not allotted to the Indians under this act, make a careful examination of such portions, for the purpose of ascertaining and listing all 40-acre or lesser governmental subdivisions on which there is standing or growing any pine timber, and which tracts are, for the purposes of this act, termed pine lands, and which pine lands shall also be appraised by said appraisers, but not less than $3 per acre. All other lands on said reservations which are not pine lands as herein defined shall, for the purposes of this act, be termed agricultural lands. The compensation of said appraisers shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, but shall in no event exceed in the aggregate $6 per day for each, including all expenses.

SEC. 5. That after the said pine lands have been surveyed, ascertained, listed, and appraised as aforesaid, the Secretary of the Interior shall, after having given two months' notice of sale through a newspaper of general circulation, published at St. Paul, Duluth, and Crookston, in said State, through the United States land officers for the district where the said lands are situated, offer for sale and sell the same at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, in 40-acre or lesser subdivisions; but such sale shall not be for a less price than the appraised value, nor shall more than one-tenth of said pine lands be disposed of in any one year, nor otherwise than in this act provided.

SEC. 6. That when any of the agricultural lands on said reservation not allotted under this act have been surveyed, the Secretary of the Interior shall give thirty days' notice thereof, through at least two of the principal papers published in the State of Minnesota, and at the expiration of said thirty days the said agricultural lands so surveyed shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only, under the provisions of the homestead laws: Provided, That each settler under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead laws shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him the sum of $1 for each and every acre, in four equal annual payments, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor only at the expiration of five years from the date of entry, according to said homestead laws, and after the full payment of said $1 per acre therefor, and due proof of occupancy for said period of five years, and any conveyance of said lands so taken as a homestead, or any contract touching the same, prior to the date of final entry shall be null and void: Provided further, That any person who has not heretofore had the benefit of the homestead or pre-emption law, and who has failed from any cause to perfect title to a tract of land heretofore entered by him under either of said laws, may make a second homestead entry under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That all money accruing from the disposal of said lands in conformity with the provisions of this act shall, after deducting all the expenses of making the census, of obtaining the cession and relinquishment, of making the removal and allotments, and of completing the surveys and appraisals, in this act provided, be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of all the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as a permanent fund, which shall draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, payable annually, for the period of fifty years after the allotments provided for in this act have been made, and which interest and permanent fund shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians in the manner following: One-half of said interest shall, during the said period of fifty years, except in the cases hereinafter otherwise provided, be annually paid in cash in equal shares to the heads of families and guardians of orphan minors; and one-fourth of said interest shall, during the same period and with the like exception, be annually paid in cash in equal shares to all other classes of said Indians; and the remaining one-fourth of said interest shall, during the said period of fifty years, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, be devoted exclusively to the establishment and maintenance of a system of free schools among said Indians, in their midst and for their benefit; and, at the expiration of the said fifty years, the said permanent fund shall be divided and paid to all of said Chippewa Indians and their issue then living, in cash, in equal shares. The United States shall, for the benefit of said Indians, advance to them as such interest as aforesaid, the sum of $90,000 annually, counting from the time when the removal and allotments provided for in this act shall have been made, until such time as said permanent fund, exclusive of the deductions hereinbefore provided for, shall equal or exceed the sum of $3,000,000, less any actual interest that may in the mean time accrue from accumulations of said permanent fund; the payments of such interest to be made yearly in advance, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of Interior, may, as to three-fourths thereof, during the first five years be expended in procuring live-stock, teams, farming implements, and seed for such of the Indians to the extent of their shares as are fit and desire to engage in farming, but as to the rest, in cash; and whenever said permanent fund shall exceed the sum of $3,000,000 the United States shall be fully reimbursed out of such excess, for all the advances of interest made as herein contemplated and other expenses hereunder; and as soon as the United States have been fully reimbursed for all the advances and expenses contemplated and incurred under this act, and the said permanent fund shall exceed the sum of $3,000,000, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, expend of such excess, not to exceed 10 per cent. thereof annually, for the benefit of said Indians, in the same manner and in like proportion as the interest of said permanent fund.

SEC. 8. That the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for procuring the cession and relinquishment, making the census, surveys, appraisals, removals and allotments, and the first annual payment of interest, herein contemplated and provided for, which money shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; a detailed statement of which expenses, except the interest aforesaid, shall be reported to Congress when the expenditures shall be completed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 11854) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I reserve all points of order.

UNITED STATES PRISON.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I am requested by the Judiciary Committee to ask unanimous consent that the 9th day of January be set apart for the consideration of a bill, the purpose of which is to establish a United States prison; and I hope that the request of the committee will be granted.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. While I am in favor of that bill, I will object.

Mr. WEAVER. I object.

ICE HARBOR IN QUINCY BAY.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to print a small petition in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois to print a petition in the RECORD? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

QUINCY, ILL., December 10, 1888.

To the honorable Speaker and Congress of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

GENTLEMEN: The city council of the city of Quincy in session, having in view the good of this city and vicinity, and also having in view the great benefits that will accrue to the commerce of the Mississippi River as well as to this city by the proper development and improvement of Quincy Bay as an ice harbor, do respectfully request your honorable body to consider the necessity of an appropriation for the making of an ice harbor in Quincy Bay, and also for the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Des Moines Rapids to the mouth of the Illinois River, and that your honorable body will at this present session appropriate at least $500,000 for those improvements, and that at least $100,000 of it be expended in the making of an ice harbor in Quincy Bay.

Hoping this will meet your hearty approval,

E. J. THOMPSON, Mayor.
J. F. DUANT, Alderman First ward.
C. A. BABCOCK, Alderman Second ward.
G. H. WALLER, Alderman First ward.
T. H. SWIMMER, Alderman Second ward.
T. J. SHEA, Fifth ward.
J. F. FITZGERALD, Alderman Fifth ward.
JOHN NESSLER, Alderman Third ward.
HENRY PRANTE, Fourth ward.
FRANCIS WM. HECKENKAMP, Alderman Third ward.
JOHN H. FISCHER, Alderman Fourth ward.
A. C. BICKHAM, Alderman Sixth ward.
MICHAEL ARNOLD, Sixth ward.

Attest: J. F. WEMHOEVER, City Clerk.

JACOB ROGERS.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. 11624) to increase the pension of Jacob Rogers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. MCMILLIN (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. GIFFORD: Of the Argus-Leader Company, of Sioux Falls, Dak.

By Mr. HAYES: Of citizens of Delmar and of Clinton, Iowa.

By Mr. HOLMES: Of J. B. Swinburn, of Humboldt, Kans.; and of Hon. J. Fred. Meyers and Charles K. Meyers, of Denison, Iowa.

By Mr. MERRIMAN: Of printers, electrotypers, and others, of New York and Brooklyn.

By Mr. RICE: Of Edward C. Gattey, of Pine City, and of S. P. and J. W. Robie, of Rush City, Minn.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PACIFIC COAST DEFENSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of June 11, 1888, such correspondence as has been found of record from April 15, 1861, to August 20, 1866, of the War Department with the division commanders of the Pacific and the department commanders of the Columbia and California, in relation to the subject of raising and organizing volunteer troops for the purpose of guarding the overland and inland mail and emigrant routes; which was read.

Mr. DOLPH. This communication is sent in response to a resolution which was introduced by myself. The correspondence is more voluminous than was anticipated. I move that the communication, with the accompanying papers, lie on the table for the present, to be called up at some future time by myself.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of the New Hampshire Baptist Convention, praying that commerce be so regulated between the United States and Africa as to prevent the exportation of all intoxicating liquors to be used among the inhabitants on the west coast of Africa, and especially in the Congo Free State. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR presented a petition of the Ladies' Art Association of New York City, praying for the continuance of the work begun by J. Schoënhof, consul at Tunstall, on "Technical Education in Europe;" which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10240) for the relief of J. Edwin Pilcher, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10240) for the relief of J. Edwin Pilcher, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9211) for the relief of Jesse Durnell, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6012) for the relief of A. P. Swineford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3737) for the relief of Sterling H. Tucker and others, reported it without amendment, and on his motion it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9654) granting an increase of pension to Jesse J. Clark, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. EVARTS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Association, to report it with amendments, which are rather in reference to the exactitude of expression than otherwise. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage. The Senate passed a bill at the last session equivalent to this, and the House has passed this bill. The changes here made, as will appear from the reading of the amendments which I send up, are merely as to the exactitude of phrases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks that the bill just reported by him may be now considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read at length for information, with the amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read at length, with the amendments proposed by the committee, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? If there be none, it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and, having been read at length, the amendments proposed by the committee will be stated.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Library were, in line 9, after the word "created," to insert "in the District of Columbia;" in line 15, after the word "Columbia," to insert "so far only as may be necessary to its lawful ends;" in line 17, after the word "by-laws," to insert "not inconsistent with law," and at the end of line 18, before the word "hold," to strike out "shall" and insert "may;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Andrew D. White, of Ithaca, in the State of New York; George Bancroft, of Washington, in the District of Columbia; Justin Winsor, of Cambridge, in the State of Massachusetts; William F. Poole, of Chicago, in the State of Illinois; Herbert B. Adams, of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland; Clarence W. Bowen, of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, their associates and successors, are hereby created in the District of Columbia a body corporate and politic, by the name of the American Historical Association, for the promotion of historical studies, the collection and preservation of historical manuscripts, and for kindred purposes in the interest of American history and of history in America. Said association is authorized to hold real and personal estate in the District of Columbia, so far as may be necessary to its lawful ends, to an amount not exceeding $500,000, to adopt a constitution, and to make by-laws not inconsistent with law. Said association shall have its principal office at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and may hold its annual meetings in such places as the said incorporators shall determine. Said association shall report annually to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution concerning its proceedings and the condition of historial study in America. Said Secretary shall communicate to Congress the whole of such reports, or such portion thereof as he shall see fit. The Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are authorized to permit said association to deposit its collections, manuscripts, books, pamphlets, and other material for history in the Smithsonian Institution or in the National Museum, at their discretion, upon such conditions and under such rules as they shall prescribe.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 3740) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase a lot in the city of Jacksonville, Fla., for military purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3741) for an armored cruiser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3742) authorizing the construction of fortifications for New York, Boston, Charleston, S. C., San Francisco, and other ports, and for acquiring the plans, patents, machinery, and electrical apparatus by purchase, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I am not familiar with the bill, but the person who desires to have it introduced wishes it to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3743) granting a pension to Mary Casack; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3744) granting a pension to Andrew J. Hodge; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 3745) to grant a land-warrant to Mrs. Bridget Jefferson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HISCOCK (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3746) for the relief of Miss Eliza A. White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. R. 122) declaring the sense of Congress in respect of the connection of European governments with interoceanic canals at the Isthmus of Darien and in Central America was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government of the United States will look with serious concern and disapproval upon any connection of any European government with the construction or control of any ship-canal across the Isthmus of Darien or across Central America, and must regard any such connection or control as injurious to the just rights and interests of the United States and as a menace to their welfare.

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate this expression of the views of Congress to the governments of the countries of Europe.

CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR OF VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate what sum remains unexpended of the appropriation of $825,000, made by appropriation act approved September 7, 1888, for the construction and repair of vessels and other purposes, under the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and whether or not that sum is sufficient for the remaining service of the current fiscal year, and if not, what further appropriation is required, and for the repair of what vessels it is needed.

Also, that said Secretary be directed to inform the Senate how much money has been expended for the construction of the armored turret-vessel Maine, the hull of which has been commenced at the New York navy-yard.

NEW YORK CUSTOM-HOUSE SITE.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all advertisements which have been made for proposals for the site for the New York custom-house and buildings to be connected therewith, and to inform the Senate whether the size of such site so advertised for as described and required in said advertisement is greater or less than that of the land now occupied by the United States for such purposes.

ANDREW M'DONOUGH.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to inform the Senate what is the date of enlistment and discharge of Andrew McDonough, late a soldier in a New York regiment in the Mexican war.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE TENNESSEE AND CUMBERLAND.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the consent of the Senate to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 10023) to authorize the Cairo and Tennessee River Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment in section 4, line 17, after the word "be," to insert "commenced or;" so as to make the section read:

That any bridges authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of said rivers as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said company or corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridges, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of 1 mile above and 1 mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the rivers, the shore-lines at high and low water, the direction and strength of the currents at all stages, and the soundings, accurately showing the bed of the stream, the location of any other bridge or bridges, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridges are approved by the Secretary of War the bridges shall not be commenced or built, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridges during the progress of construction such changes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

YOUNG'S BAY BRIDGE.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. If it will take no time.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a motion to reconsider a bill which was passed yesterday?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed yesterday the bill (S. 3645) granting to the Astoria and South Coast Railway Company the right to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in the county of Clatsop and State of Oregon. If the Senator will indulge me in a brief statement, I will say that I reported the bill yesterday by inadvertence and under the impression that it had been passed upon by the committee, but after it was read at the desk I discovered many imperfections and defects in the bill. I ask now that the Senate reconsider its action in order to amend it and pass it in the amended form.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator does not wish to have the bill passed this morning?

Mr. VEST. I have no interest in the matter. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] wants to have it passed, and I have no objection to its being passed in proper form.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Missouri has the amendments prepared that he desires to offer?

Mr. VEST. Yes; I have the amendments ready.

Mr. DOLPH. It will take but a moment to amend the bill. The bill was read and passed yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. If it takes no time I am willing to yield.

Mr. VEST. It is merely a formal matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and passed will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate. The Senator from Missouri proposes certain amendments, which will be stated in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 11, after the word "not," it is proposed to strike out the word "unduly;" in line 13, after the word "be," to insert "according to such plans and of such materials and dimensions;" in lines 16 and 17, to strike out the words "by permanent embankment or otherwise," and insert "according to such plans and of such dimensions and materials and with such embankments and safeguards;" and in line 17, to strike out the word "approve," and insert "require;" so as to read:

That the Astoria and South Coast Railway Company, a corporation organized under the law of Oregon, with its principal office at Astoria, in the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct a bridge across Young's Bay, a navigable stream in said county and State, at such point as the said company may select, and may be approved by the Secretary of War, with such channel-spans, draws, safeguards, and auxiliary works as shall cause the bridge not to obstruct or hinder the navigation of the waters crossed by it; and that said channel-spans and structures shall be according to such plans and of such materials and dimensions as the Secretary of War may prescribe; and also to construct, establish, and maintain a bridge across Skipanon Creek, in the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, according to such plans and of such dimensions and materials and with such embankments and safeguards as the Secretary of War may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, after line 17, to add:

And the construction of said bridges shall not be commenced until the Secretary of War approves the plans and dimensions of the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 18, after the word "That," to strike out "said" and insert "if said bridges shall be constructed as draw-bridges, the;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That if said bridges shall be constructed as draw-bridges, the draws shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signals for the passage of ships and boats, and in no case shall unnecessary delay occur; and said company shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridges as the Light-House Board shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 17, before the word "map," to strike out "a" and insert "an accurate;" in lines 19 and 20, to strike out the words "which map shall be on a scale of at least one to twenty thousand;" and in line 21, after the word "shall," to strike out "reasonably" and insert "accurately;" so as to read:

And to secure that object the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of such bridge across Young's Bay, and an accurate map of Young's Bay from the mouths of its navigable tributaries to the adjacent ship-channel, and whose topography of the shores and hydrography shall accurately represent the banks, the bottom, and steam-boat channels by contours of 6 feet, and which shall be accompanied by other maps, drawn to a scale of 1 inch to 200 feet, giving, within areas of one-fourth of a mile from each draw-span, an accurate representation of the bottom of the bay by contour lines 2 feet apart, determined by accurate soundings, and also showing the force and direction of the currents at each 2 feet of tidal stage, by triangulated observations on suitable floats.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after section 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That if other railroad corporations shall desire to use the bridges herein authorized to be constructed for the passage over the same of their locomotives, cars, or trains, they shall have such privilege upon terms to be agreed upon between such corporations and the owners or lessees of such bridges, and if the parties can not agree upon such terms then the matter shall be determined by the Secretary of War, whose decision upon the subject shall be final.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change section 3 to section 4, and to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That if the construction of the bridges hereby authorized shall not be commenced within two years and finished within four years from the time this act takes effect, then all the privileges and powers herein granted shall cease and this act shall be null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. SPOONER. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Iowa for a moment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor in his own right.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the message from the House of Representatives relative to the public building at San Francisco be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices in San Francisco, Cal.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 5, to strike out "$850,000" and insert "$650,000."

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. STANFORD, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 17th instant approved and signed the act (S. 3475) granting the use of certain lands in Pierce County, Washington Territory, to the city of Tacoma for the purposes of a public park.

The message also announced that the President had on the 18th instant approved and signed the act (S. 2040) to establish a land office at Folsom, in the Territory of New Mexico.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. If there be no objection, that leave will be considered as granted.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the substitute reported by the Committee on Finance will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

174. Gold-leaf, $2 per package of five hundred leaves.
175. Hollow-ware, coated, glazed, or tinned, 2½ cents per pound.
176. Lead.—Lead ore and lead dross, 1½ cents per pound: Provided, That lead ore containing silver or silver ore containing lead shall pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge to the provisions about the importation of lead and silver ores. I will state to him that there is a very extensive business now in the importation of ores which contain silver and lead, from Mexico to the port of El Paso, and there are two smelting establishments, which have been erected by enterprising gentlemen of that town, costing about $500,000, for the purpose of reducing those ores. They are then sent elsewhere for separation. The business is a growing and important business, and very many are interested in it with their capital.

I should be very glad, if there is no reason to the contrary, that these ores might be admitted free of duty. I do not know that there is any interest in this country that makes it necessary to exclude them. It is a profitable business to a portion of our people, a considerable trade is springing up in that direction, and it would be very much enlarged if it was relieved from the taxation that is now imposed upon it. I believe the committee propose to retain the same rate that has existed heretofore.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas makes no motion, I believe, respecting paragraph 176. I will say to him that the commitee, on an examination of this subject, believed that lead ore coming in in connection with silver ores ought to pay the duty that other lead ore pays. That is all there is in this provision. I do not see why the smelters of silver ore should object to paying the duty which everybody else pays upon lead ore imported into this country. That is all there is in the question.

Mr. REAGAN. I made no motion, because I felt that it would be useless to submit a motion unless the proposition met with the approval of the committee which have the bill in charge.

Mr. TELLER. This is a matter of particular interest to the Northwest, where lead is produced. It was reported, and is no doubt true, that during the last year about 20,000 tons of lead ore came in from Mexico without paying any duty under the claim that it was silver ore. I am informed by those who have been to Mexico and have looked into this matter that the importation of lead ore under the claim that it is silver ore during the current year will probably be twice if not three times that of the former importations. This is a fraud on the revenue laws of the country.

They take pure lead ores that are worth little or comparatively little for silver and mix them with high-grade silver ores. They do not mix them exactly. They run in a car-load of high-grade silver ore with several car-loads of low-grade silver ore; that is, high-grade lead ore, but low in silver. The average of the three or four or five car-loads is what is taken, and if it is more valuable for silver than for lead the lead comes in free. So practically to-day the lead-miners of Mexico who are working the lead-mines of that country are importing their lead ore into this country free of duty.

The lead-miners of Mexico do not get a third of the wages received by the lead-miners of Colorado and Missouri and other sections of the Northwest where lead is produced. The great bulk of lead now produced is produced in the State of Colorado and the Territory of Montana and other Northwestern Territories. It is estimated that the silver-miners of Colorado lost last year not less than $800,000 by the free importation of lead ore. We have in Colorado a great number of silver-mines, so called, that can not be worked if the price of lead goes much lower than it is to-day. The lead is largely the profit in the works.

The committee have done well, in my judgment, in providing that lead ore which comes in under whatever claim shall pay a duty. There is no reason, and none can be given, why a cargo of lead ore, because it contains more in value of silver than it does of lead, should come in free. The silver comes in free, of course; there is no objection to that; but there is no reason why the lead ore should come in free from Mexico any more than it should come in free from Spain or any other country.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator from Colorado will allow me to say that lead ore coming in containing silver, or silver ore containing lead, is by this clause to pay 1½ cents per pound. So silver does not come in free under this bill.

Mr. TELLER. There is nothing charged on silver. If a ton of lead ore is worth $40 of silver and $10 of lead, the duty is upon the $10 of lead; the silver comes in free.

Mr. REAGAN. That is not the way I understand it is to operate. However, I will not ask to detain the Senate now, but I will ask that this clause be passed over until I can prepare a proper amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not necessary to pass it over; the amendment can be moved at any time.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Texas one moment with regard to this item. This will not be a tax upon silver, because the amount of silver in this ore adds very little to its weight per pound, and the tax is 1½ cents per pound. The fact that the ore contains silver will add very little to a pound of lead ore. It is the lead ore that has to pay the duty; the effect of the silver is imperceptible. So there is no duty upon silver practically, because its weight would be nothing. One cent and a half a pound would be a mere trifle on it.

I wish to say further with regard to this item that the existing law has not been executed and can not be executed without considerable expense. The Department has ruled, and the Committee on the Judiciary has sanctioned the ruling, that this importation is considered silver ore if it contains in it silver of more value than the lead, and it is considered lead ore if it contains more value in lead than in silver. This creates the necessity of establishing sampling works at all the points of importation in order to execute the law and so that it may be of any advantage.

No such sampling works have been established, and it is left to guess. It is entirely indeterminate. By looking at a cargo of ore you can tell nothing about its value. No sampling establishments have been erected at the points of importation to sample and assay the ore to determine which element it contains is of the greater value. The importers simply allege that the ore is more valuable in silver, and there may be a lump or two of ore taken out of the top of the car which contains more in value of silver, or there may be a car-load of silver ore that is used in convoy—that is, a car-load of silver ore that is conveyed in trains of lead ore, and it so happens that the lead ore comes in free. Very little, if any, duty is collected. At first we collected some duty on the lead ore, but latterly there has been a very large increase of importations and the article has come in free, as the record will show.

I have not the record at hand, but that is the fact. The increase of the importation of lead ore is very great, and it is destructive to silver-mining. In all the States and Territories where silver-mining is prosecuted there are mines containing both silver and lead. The cost of transportation from these places is very great, and they have no establishments there, and can not without great expense obtain them, to separate the lead from the silver, and in places where low-priced lead will not pay its transportation it is a very great detriment to both silver and gold mining, because you have a body of lead ore that you can not transport. It is so shipped from abroad that it destroys or embarrasses both gold and silver mining. In Utah they have a great deal of lead ore that contains both silver and gold, but the lead largely predominates, and when they smelt it, they have a large bulk of lead. If lead ore is so reduced in price that it will not bear transportation the result is to close down the silver-mines. It has closed down a great many silver-mines in my State and it is closing down silver-mines in Montana and Idaho and Utah, because the lead ore does not pay the cost of transportation. The reason is that both from the north and south of us lead is shipped in those forms under the head of silver ore in large quantities, bringing down the price of lead so low that it is a drug in the silver and gold mining regions; and this operates more injuriously than almost anything which you can conceive.

The mines of gold and silver are prosecuted so long as they pay anything; a very slight percentage stops the mining. All the mines will be conducted with the hope of doing better so long as they pay anything at all, so long as there is any mining, and even after the margin is lost. The low price of lead ore is reducing the margin and embarrasssing both gold and silver mining. The importation of the lead ore, if it did not affect the other mining, would not be so injurious.

Any amendment of the law that involves inspection, that involves sampling, puts the parties to considerable cost. It costs from 75 cents to $1.50 a ton to sample it. They have to unload to sample, and that may run it up to $2 a ton. This would make it very expensive to sample.

In order to execute the present law the ore must be sampled. Several of us have called upon the Secretary of the Treasury and suggested that this law must be executed, that cost what it might it must be executed and the ore sampled, and he has that matter now under consideration. It is a question of expense. The weight of the silver in the ore amounts to nothing.

The amendment of the law contained in this clause of the bill will cure the difficulty. It keeps it where it is now, and it will be enforced, and it is very important to the States and Territories that are engaged in mining that it should be enforced. Besides, it gives the ore a greater value to bear a portion of the transportation and not be a detriment and almost a hindrance to mining in the West.

Upon this question the miners in the West feel more interest than any other, not so much on account of the price of lead ore, but on account of the fact that they have the lead ore and can not get rid of it. The price is below the point of transportation, and they have to stop gold and silver mining to a great extent. This law can be executed, because you can tell at once without any expensive examination whether the article is lead ore containing silver, or silver ore containing lead. That can be easily ascertained.

It will save expense. If the present law is executed, as it can be by sampling works, the tariff on lead would be much higher than under the proposed law, because the importers would have to add the expense of sampling.

So I think the Senator from Texas, if he will consider it and examine it, will be willing to allow the provision to stand in the way it was at first.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the law as it now stands is that lead ore and lead dross shall pay 1½ cents per pound. The amendment to it now proposed by this bill is:

Lead ore and lead dross, 1½ cents per pound: Provided, That lead ore containing silver or silver ore containing lead shall pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound.

In the presentation of this question by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] it is suggested that the duty on silver in this would be unimportant, that it is substantially free. If, then, we strike out the proviso and let the law stand as it is, we can collect the duty on lead ore and lead dross, and leave silver free. I will ask the judgment of the Senate on striking out the proviso.

I mention, however, that as it stands now the ad valorem duty, as it appears by the calculation here, under the existing law, on lead ore and lead dross is 59.27 per cent.; under the House bill it would be 29.63; under the Senate bill lead ore and lead dross and lead ore containing silver and silver ore containing lead would be 59.27 per cent. So it will be seen that the Senate proposition is much more onerous on the importation of lead ore containing silver and silver ore containing lead than the existing law, and doubly more onerous than under the proposition contained in the House bill.

With a view of getting the sense of the Senate upon that and in order that we may not embarrass this industry too far, and as I am informed by the Representative from that district there is $500,000 invested in smelting establishments at El Paso now—to avoid breaking up that industry, because I am advised that the Senate amendment will break it up, I will move to strike out the proviso to the Senate amendment and ask the judgment of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the proviso from line 745 to line 747, as follows:

Provided, That lead ore containing silver or silver ore containing lead shall pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. STEWART. I will say in regard to the establishments referred to that they have been erected because this law has not been enforced, because all the lead ore has come in free, convoyed by silver ore. I have called the attention of the Department to it frequently. They have established no means to ascertain whether the lead predominates in value or not. They have that now finally under consideration. Whether they will do anything or not I do not know. It would be considerable expense and trouble to execute the law. The non-execution of it has caused the erection of these works along the line to work lead ore. If the law was executed and each cargo sampled, these establishments would never have been put up. They are put up because there is no duty on the lead ore, owing to the way the law is executed; and this clause does not increase the duty on lead ore at all. It simply makes it easy to execute the law. If these works are established for smelting lead it leaves them just where they are. The duty on lead ore by the Senate bill is precisely the same as it was before—1½ cents a pound. The old law was not executed; this can be.

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I am not very well informed upon the subject, but I understand that the chief importance in this importation is the silver ore that has lead in it. The chief importance of the importation is the silver.

Mr. STEWART. It happens that the lead ore is of chief importance to these smelting establishments, and it is brought in for the purpose of smelting the lead. The Mexican people understand how to reduce silver ore as well as we do. They will reduce it at home; they will not bring it here for reduction. It is the lead ore and the silver combined that are sent here. The lead brought into the smelting works of this country is not used for the purpose of working silver ore. The Mexicans understand how to work silver ores that can be amalgamated as well as we do, and they work them cheaper; but it is the lead ore that is brought into this country for the purpose of working up the lead ores.

Mr. REAGAN. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I can not conceive, while I do not know the fact, that lead ore and lead dross would be made a subject of import by railroad transportation unless there was a very large amount of silver in it.

Mr. STEWART. The lead ore is valuable, and is brought in here and it is worked with cheap labor. It is valuable here for the purpose of using it in smelting works to work other ores with, but it does not add anything. The weight of the silver does not amount to anything; it is unappreciable. This provision simply enables us to have the law executed, which we have not had; but we have had a great many mines all over the country closed down for the want of the enforcement of this law. It is too difficult to enforce. If the Senator's amendment prevails, then we shall have the same question, whether the ore contains greater value in lead or greater value in silver. It is very complicated, and it is very difficult to determine the fact.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to state to the Senator from Texas that of the large amount of lead produced in this country 85 per cent. is produced in what are called the silver mines. The reduction in the price of lead which has occurred recently is largely the result of this importation, which has made the lead product a trifle more than the demand in this country, and only a trifle more, and has reduced the price to such an extent that a large number of silver mines are to-day practically closed, waiting for an advance in the price of the lead product.

Leadville, that produces at least $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 of silver a year, produces also a large amount of lead; and many of the most profitable mines have been worked in connection with the lead ore. More than one mine is to-day, if not absolutely closed, running on short time, waiting for an advance in the price of lead. If this lead-ore importation increases next year, as is believed by the people who have gone to Mexico and examined the question—and I have conversed with some gentlemen who have taken the pains to go from the State of Colorado to Mexico to see what the lead product will be—it will be at least twice what it was last year, or 40,000 tons. I am told by those who ought to know that the amount will be 80,000 tons. That means the entire prostration of the lead industry in the United States; it means the closing of the silver mines of Montana and the silver mines of Colorado and of Utah and of Idaho, and the entire closing of every common lead-mine in the United States.

Everybody who is familiar with this question understands that we can not compete with Mexican labor in the production of lead. In the mining camps of the United States we pay the largest labor prices in the world. A common laborer gets from three to four times as much as the same class of labor gets in Mexico, and more than twice as much as he gets in any other part of the United States.

Some Senator inquires what the laborers get a day. They get from two and a half to four dollars a day. A common miner gets $4 a day who works in the mine. The men who work on top of the mine, at the mouth of the pit, and do a great many outside jobs, get from $1.75 to $2.50; but the miner who works in the mine, who mines the silver or lead itself, gets from $3.50 to $4 a day. We can not compete with the cheap labor of other countries in mining.

There has been no complaint of the price of lead. The consumption of lead in this country until recently has just about equaled its production, so that we have had no lead to send abroad, but we have bought a little lead all the time from foreign countries. If this is continued we shall have a surplus of lead in this country. We can not export lead. Everybody knows that we can not come in contact with the lead-mines of Germany and their low wages. We can not come in contact with the lead-mines of Spain, where they pay but 40 cents a day to the laborer, who in Colorado gets $3, $3.50, or $4 a day.

Everybody understands that this lead can come as ballast from any seaport in Spain and be laid down in any of our Atlantic seaports without a single cent of charge; and when lead goes down, as it will go down under this importation from Mexico, the result is to close the silver-mines of the United States, for nearly all the silver in this country comes in connection with lead and nearly all the lead comes in connection with silver, or at least 85 per cent. of the 155,000 tons that we mined last year came from silver. That means the closing of the silver-mines. It means the reduction of the silver product of this country and the gold product, too, because from all the silver-mines more or less gold comes out in connection with the silver. These three things go together—lead, silver, and gold. Of course some of the mines are gold-mines and have no connection with silver, but the gold-mines of Nevada in particular are connected with silver-mines.

This is a matter of especial interest to the mining regions of this country, which are rapidly being developed, and it is a blow at them. I do not think the Senator from Texas is justified in his position on the ground that somebody has built smelting works at El Paso. The owners of those works can still continue to smelt, and if the foreigners will send in the Mexican silver ores that do not contain lead, of which there is a great amount in Mexico, they will come in free as they do now. There is no duty on the silver ore. If we should import silver ore containing 32 ounces to the ton, which is good ore, it would have 2 pounds only of silver. If it ran to $50 a ton, it would be practically imperceptible. So when you come to weigh up this ore the silver does not amount to anything; it is imperceptible in the calculation. There is no reason why $25 worth of lead ore should come in free because there happens to be $26 worth of silver connected with it. It is an evasion of the law, and, in my judgment, it is a misconstruction of the law. This ruling was made years ago, when there was no practical question presented by it, when the total importation of lead in a year would not have amounted, I suppose, to 100 or 500 tons in connection with silver ore. Now it has grown up to 20,000 tons. It will be 40,000 tons this year, and 80,000 next, if not 80,000 this year. So it is a matter of very vital importance to us in the Northwest.

Mr. REAGAN. I dislike to detain the Senate, but I do desire to say a word more.

I do not see the danger to the mining interests of the United States which seems to occur to the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Nevada. When we consider the amount of lead which is mined—and that is the burden of their argument—the amount which may come in through the port of El Paso by railroad transportation is quite unimportant in reference to the aggregate amount that is mined in the United States, and when it is understood that the transportation of these ores by railroad, especially if they are not rich in silver, to the place of reduction in the territory of the United States is itself a percentage of cost against that description of labor, which would necessarily exclude it on account of the cheapness of lead unless there is a large per cent. of silver in it. So that I do not think there is any great danger to the interests of American miners to permit the law to stand as it is, with 1½ cents per pound tax upon lead ore and lead dross. That is the law at present, and certainly with the price of lead that is a very high duty. It is set down in this table as an ad valorem duty of 59.21 per cent. That would be the same under the Senate bill, except that it is extended to lead ores which contain silver and to silver ores which contain lead.

It has been one of the arguments in favor of the protective policy that when industries have grown up under it we should be careful not to destroy them by violent changes. We are advised that this change of the law will destroy an established business, for I have informed Senators that I learned from the Representative of that district that smelting establishments valued at $500,000 have been erected for the purpose of reducing these ores. This industry is to be destroyed and that capital destroyed if this amendment proposed by the Senate is adopted.

By the reasoning which is employed in vindication of the protective policy, we ought not to make so violent a change of the law as to destroy an industry; and I submit that there can be no danger to the interests of American miners and it would be fair and just to those who have invested their capital in view of the fact that the ores which come in have to meet the expense of transportation from the Mexican territory to the territory of the United States.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, to allow the law to remain as it is, as it would do if the amendment of my colleague shall prevail, will leave this subject—the importation of lead ore and lead dross—in full harmony with the plan and theory of this bill. "Lead in pigs or bars" under the existing law pays a duty of 2 cents per pound; under the Senate bill, 2 cents per pound. "Lead in sheets, pipes, or shot," under existing law pays 3 cents per pound, and 2½ cents per pound under this bill. Now I submit, Mr. President, that 1½ cents per pound for lead ore and dross is fully as high, is indeed a higher duty than 2 and 3 cents per pound for the refined article, for the reduced article, and I submit that it is in harmony with the theory of the Senate bill that the importation of that upon which labor must be expended shall be encouraged. When the lead ore and the lead dross is brought into this country American labor must take hold of it, must purify it, and make it marketable. As my colleague has stated, there is an establishment at El Paso erected for the purpose of doing that thing with lead ore and lead dross imported from Mexico. To so legislate as to destroy the business of that establishment will be destructive to that extent not only of individual interest, but of the theory of the bill, which professes to encourage and protect American labor. It is the labor that is expended upon this item of importation after it reaches this country which brings it within the protective favor of this bill, and I insist that the duty assessed upon it when it comes into this country is a greater duty in proportion than that levied upon the reduced or the pure article of lead.

I submit to the gentlemen on the other side that they will do violence to the theory of their own bill if they raise the duty upon lead dross and lead ore which must be taken hold of by American labor when it gets here and leave the duty on the article ready for market as it now stands, and I hope that they will be willing to leave the law as it now is.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, what we want is a mode of enforcing the duty that is now levied. No duty at all is now collected on the lead ore practically. It comes in free as silver ore. Silver ore is on the free-list. There is a duty of 1½ cents a pound on lead ore. The Treasury Department holds that if there is greater value in the ore of silver than of lead ore, then it comes in free as silver ore, and in the absence of sampling works the importer says what he pleases about it, and he brings it all in free practically. That is the practical working of it, and I am familiar with it. I have been working on it for a year.

There is another clause in the law which I called the attention of the Secretary to, under which he might have imposed a duty. It is the clause in the existing law which says:

> Mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

I suggested that lead and silver ores, or lead, gold, and silver ores that were in combination might come in under this general provision. The reply was that it had already been decided that they were specially provided for, and consequently the Secretary of the Treasury would not impose the duty under that head. Then, I have urged upon him that he must ascertain which metal in a given quantity of ore was in the greatest value. That he will probably not do; if he does, it will cause an expense of from $1 to $2 a ton to load and unload and sample the ore. That would be a considerable tax, so he lets it all in free.

This bill simply imposes a duty of 1½ cents a pound, which the law now does, upon lead ore, and the only addition to it is the weight of the silver, which amounts to nothing if it happens to have silver in it. Practically, however, it is no change in the law, but it is making it possible to execute it.

As to this new industry that is said to have grown up, it has grown up with the knowledge that there was a duty of 1½ cents a pound on lead ore and with the further knowledge that that duty was not collected. It is not collected now. All we want is to have it collected. That industry has sprung up to the destruction of much larger industries. The gold and silver mines, take the Eureka for instance, are about equal in value in gold and silver, and they contain lead enough for smelting purposes. Then the ore has got to be transported at great expense. Then there are mines in the interior, away from the railroads, and the product has to be hauled by teams and sometimes packed on mules; and if the lead ore is worth nothing it prevents the mining of gold and silver to a very alarming extent.

The depreciation of silver has closed down a very large number of mines, but this cheap lead ore that will not pay the cost of transportation is the last straw that is breaking the camel's back. There was a delegation here from Montana a few days ago, who said they would have to close down a large number of silver-mines if they could not get a different construction of the law. Many of the leading men of Montana were here. There has been a delegation here from Utah. There has been a vast amount of money invested in establishments in Utah, and the whole prosperity of that Territory, as far as mining is concerned, depends on working these lead ores. They can not work their silver or gold mines without them.

You are breaking up industries all over the country; you are throwing twenty men out of employment, yes, fifty or one hundred men out of employment, where you will employ one in these reduction works, and from all over the country there have been protests and letters and discussions over this subject for the last two years, since this large importation commenced, and it is increasing largely. It is perfectly alarming. There will be lead enough produced in this country, so that the price will not go up materially, but we want to keep the price up sufficiently so that the ore will bear transportation. As I have said, the present system is perfectly destructive. The rate proposed in the bill is not a perceptible increase of the present duties if they could be collected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. HAWLEY (when Mr. PLATT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PLATT] on this question is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KENNA. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. FAULKNER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has a quorum voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum has not yet voted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], but with the right in respect to each of us to vote when it is necessary to keep up a quorum of the Senate. I am detained downstairs nearly all the time in the work of a select committee of the two Houses concerning the Aqueduct tunnel, but as I understand it is necessary to vote in order to make a quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. I do not see him present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. WALTHALL. My colleague [Mr. GEORGE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. ALLISON. I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], but having voted, I will transfer that pair, having authority to do so, to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. PLUMB. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Ransom,	Voorhees.
Berry,	Daniel,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Blackburn,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Blodgett,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Coke,	Payne,	Vance,

NAYS—23.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Allison,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Stewart,
Chace,	Frye,	Morrill,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Teller,
Dawes,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	Hoar,	Spooner,

ABSENT—35.

Beck,	Davis,	Hampton,	Platt,
Blair,	Eustis,	Harris,	Plumb,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Hearst,	Pugh,
Brown,	Faulkner,	Ingalls,	Quay,
Butler,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Call,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Cameron,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Gray,	Morgan,	Vest.
Cullom,	Hale,	Paddock,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REAGAN. It may be, Mr. President, that the amendment was voted against because of the difficulty of executing a law in the same terms with the present law upon this subject. In order to obviate that difficulty, I will move to amend by proposing the same provision that was adopted by the House committee, a duty of three-fourths of a cent a pound on importations of this kind. That will still make the law more onerous than it is at present, because, as gentlemen say, these things have been imported substantially without duty, but it will impose a duty of 29.46 per cent. Substantially that would make a duty of 30 per cent. upon all these ores. When we consider the weight of these ores, the amount of waste matter that is in them, and the fact that they have to be transported by railroad a considerable distance to the place of reduction, it will be seen that 30 per cent. is a very high rate of duty. I mean, considering the great weight of the ores and their small value, and the fact that they have to stand first a tax by railroad transportation before they reach the United States, this duty is very high.

I should be glad if the Senate would sustain the amendment to place this duty at three-fourths of a cent a pound, which is substantially 30 per cent. ad valorem, instead of 1½ cents a pound, which is substantially 60 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In paragraph 176, line 744, after the word "dross," it is proposed to strike out "one and one-half," and insert "three-fourths of one;" so as to read:

Lead ore and lead dross three-fourths of 1 cent per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the advice of the Chair whether a quorum has yet voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, recurring to what I stated in regard to my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], I vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and withhold my vote on that account.

Mr. VEST. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. TELLER. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON].

Mr. HARRIS Is the senior Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] recorded as voting?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He is.

Mr. HARRIS. My impression is that the Senator recorded his vote thoughtlessly. I have understood all along that the two Senators from California were paired with each other.

Mr. STEWART. The junior Senator from California [Mr. HEARST] is in favor of this duty to my certain knowledge. He takes a large interest in it.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I am not mistaken in the fact that the two Senators from California are paired, but the senior Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] is voting on information that he has as to the views of his colleague on this question.

Mr. STEWART. On this question they would both vote alike.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply did not know. I thought perhaps the senior Senator had forgotten the pair.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is absent. I think he is not paired, and hence I may state that he may be considered as paired with the Senator from California [Mr. HEARST].

Mr. STEWART. Oh, no; they agree on this question.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not mean that they are paired on this, but on other questions where they would vote differently.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bate,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Ransom,	Walthall.
Blackburn,	Daniel,	Reagan,
Blodgett,	Harris,	Vance,

NAYS—21.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Stockbridge,
Allison,	Frye,	Morrill,	Teller,
Chace,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Davis,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Stanford,
Dolph,	Manderson,	Stewart,

ABSENT—41.

Beck,	Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Farwell,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Butler,	Gibson,	Paddock,	Spooner,

Chandler,	Hall,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Plumb,
Cullom,	Hearst,	Pugh,
Eustis,	Ingalls,	Quay,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Davis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Stewart,
Bate,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Stockbridge,
Berry,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Edmunds	Morrill,	Turpie,

Cockrell,	Hale,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa,
Coke,	Harris,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.
Colquitt,	Hawley,	Ransom,
Cullom,	Hiscock,	Reagan,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having responded to their names, more than a quorum, the Secretary will again call the roll upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. As another vote will not change the result, to avoid delaying the Senate, I ask leave to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks consent to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. There being no objection, the call is withdrawn, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have some remarks to make which I presume would be as suitable at this time as any other, and unless it is infringing upon the purpose of some Senator I will proceed now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion before the Senate. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent to submit some remarks upon the bill, as the Chair supposes, at this time.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to make a motion to amend the bill, in paragraph 177, line 750, by striking out the word "two" and inserting "one and one-fourth."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have not reached that point. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of paragraph 177.

The Secretary read as follows:

177. Lead in pigs and bars, glaziers' lead, lead wire, molten and old refuse lead run into blocks and bars, and old scrap-lead fit only to be remanufactured, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. VANCE. In line 750, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert "one and one-fourth," so as to make the rate of duty 1¼ cents per pound.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the measure under consideration, for many reasons, must challenge peculiar attention and close scrutiny. The strange manner of its appearance here, its late and halting entrance upon the stage of legislative existence, and the palpable rôle it was designed to play as a factor of public deception at the close of a heated political contest, all combine to invest it with much more than an ordinary interest. Sir, it is not of natural birth. It was conceived in dread and fear of an awakening and inquiring public opinion on the subject of unjust, oppressive, and dishonest taxation, and it was born amidst plots, plans, and conspiring councils engaged in considering, not the general welfare, not the reduction of taxes, the overthrow of monopolies, nor the relief of labor, but simply the methods, however dark and desperate, of temporary political success. It is the offspring of the secret caucus conclave where the rights of the people are so often betrayed behind bolts and bars and guarded doors.

The country will not soon forget the extraordinary features of the long session of the Fiftieth Congress. The great issue of tariff reform had been announced by the President in the bold, manly accents of truth and patriotism, and on the 21st day of July last the House of Representatives, after a discussion which will live in history because of its commanding ability and wide research, sent to this body its famous bill "to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue." And then until about the 1st of October, a period of more than two months, the party in the majority on this floor and in committee took exclusive possession of the vast questions embraced in the bill which came from the House.

Days, weeks, and finally months, passed before a Senator on this side of the Chamber, whether a member of the Finance Committee or not, was allowed to know a single provision of this substitute, so suspiciously concocted in the dark and now being hurried through the Senate as if to avoid exposure. No newspaper had access to a copy of this far-reaching measure until within little more than thirty days before the election, which was, ostensibly at least, to be controlled by the position of parties on the subject of tariff taxation. The people whose daily toil, hard earnings, and personal freedom from the tyranny of avaricious, brutal monopolies were all involved in the proposed legislation, had neither sufficient time nor even the most meager opportunity to examine and to judge for themselves of its merits and of its demerits.

In the waning moments of the longest session of Congress in American history, with no quorum in either branch, this Senate substitute for the plain and effective House bill at last, on the 4th day of October, according to the date of the report of the Finance Committee, wriggled its way out of the committee-room and onto this floor. Sir, with what swift haste its progenitors then turned their backs on this Capitol, and hurrying in every direction and to distant parts, proclaimed the advent of a sort of celestial visitant bearing healing in its wings for all the ills, the burdens, and the oppressions which labor and life are heir to. With loud and persistent cries they claimed that this measure, so inauspiciously, not to say surreptitiously, brought into existence under the evil omen of the Chicago platform, was in fact full of blessings to the people; that it was fraught with an immense reduction of taxes, a remission of import duties down to the very line of revenue only, and a total deliverance of the farmer, the mechanic, the wage-worker from the crushing and accursed tribute they now pay on every necessity of life. And thus with glittering promises that they would in the future reform the abuses which in the past they had themselves created, the leaders of the Republican party, aided by millions of money loose and afloat in corrupt hands amongst floating voters, achieved a temporary check, a brief halt, in the mighty cause of labor emancipation. It is true the same leaders of the same party made the same promises four years ago in their national platform, but made not even a pretense of redeeming their pledge to correct the inequalities and abuses of the tariff until they were coerced and, as it were, put under duress to do so by the grand and powerful appeal of the Executive a year ago, and by the wise and prompt action of a Democratic House of Representatives.

But, sir, can there be any better faith in the present than in past promises emanating from the Republican party on the subject of tariff reformation? Does the measure now before us look to the liberation of the laboring men, women, and children of the United States from the bondage of monopoly taxes, or does it still more firmly and securely rivet their shackles on their weary limbs? Is this measure an honest effort to abolish that species of human serfdom which compels working people to pay a double price for the prime and absolute necessities of life in order to protect and enrich those who manufacture and sell them, or is it a mere make-shift, a fraudulent pretense, a sham assumed in the face of a dire emergency, a tub thrown to a whale in a flurry, a semblance of reform to appease a popular demand, not only without the slightest merit, but actually inflicting deeper injuries on labor than even now exist? A careful and honest examination of the details of the bill must govern the answer to these inquiries.

All those commodities of commerce and consumption by the human family which according to the natural laws of trade are most likely to seek our shores and the markets of our people from foreign countries have been, for the convenience of legislation, classified and listed into separate and designated schedules, and there marked with the amount of duty or import tax levied on them by law for the privilege of landing and competing here for purchasers. There are fourteen such schedules in the bill now before us, and by the tax rates there indicated on goods, wares, and merchandise for the right to sell in American markets we are to ascertain whether this is a real and sincere effort to relieve the people or a still further attempt to deceive and impose on them for the benefit of the arrogant owners of already ill-gotten, dishonest millions.

An examination of the question can bring a candid mind to but one conclusion. In eleven of the schedules which the bill embraces the aggregate amount of the tariff tax is increased, in two schedules there is a slight reduction, and in the one remaining schedule there is a savage sectional assault made on sugar, which is called upon to bear a reduction of duties amounting to over twenty-eight millions, the real reason being that it is one of the great agricultural products of the South. In order to protect the vast and grasping monopolies of the North from the pruning-knife of tariff reform this bill seizes upon sugar and molasses, the best revenue-paying articles in the Government, and demands that 50 per cent. of the duties heretofore imposed on their importation shall be swept away.

It is true that sugar and its kindred product, molasses, are important ingredients of comfort and enjoyment in domestic life and can be properly cheapened for the use of the people; but it is not true that these two articles should be made the scape-goats of all, and more than all, the reduction of revenue proposed by the Republican party outside of and beyond the relief extended to whisky and tobacco. There are other commodities of civilized life whose prices are controlled and fixed by tariff laws and tariff taxes which are infinitely more vital and essential to human happiness, progress, and even to human existence itself than the sugar which sweetens coffee and the molasses which embellishes cakes for the breakfast-table.

Salt and sugar are often mentioned together, but the one is the greatest curative and preservative agent in the all-wise and omnipotent economy of the planet we inhabit, while the other is merely incidental to the enjoyment rather than necessary to the existence of mankind. From the first hour in which history gives us a glimpse of our most remote progenitors down to this day, salt has stood in the first rank of human necessities. Its use has for more than four thousand years distinguished the civilized man from the savage. It was created in the beginning in close alliance with air and water; it requires but slight artificial aid in its production, and it should be as free to the uses of the world, without tax, levy, let, or hindrance, as any other element of nature bestowed by the great Giver of good gifts.

The salt seas of the globe should be an example and a guide for the legislation of governments. By their incessant and sleepless processes of evaporation they impregnate the atmosphere with that saving power and grace of salt which alone purifies the realm of matter and preserves the human family from extinction. In the humbler functions of this great natural agent of the existence and the progress of mankind it is safe to say that no man, woman, or child eats a single mouthful without its beneficent presence and aid. The bread and butter, beef-steak, mutton-chops, sausages, ham and eggs, roast turkeys, tenderloins, venisons, ribs of beef, the young and juicy pig, immortalized by Charles Lamb, and the vegetable accompaniments to this whole list, can not be brought to the table or received as food in civilized life without the immediate presence and contact of salt.

And yet on this article of supreme and all-pervading necessity a tariff tax of 79.68 per cent., nearly $80 of tax on every hundred dollars' worth of salt, is imposed by this bill, not because the Government needs the revenue derived from this source, but simply for the protection of a few salt-manufacturing millionaires at Syracuse, Saginaw, and Kanawha in the serene and unmolested enjoyment of their most unrighteous monopoly. As if, however, an enormous salt tax was not sufficient in itself to inspire the American people with a deep disgust and hatred for such a policy, a discrimination is made in its application, which would justify the farmers and stock-raisers of the West, and indeed throughout the whole country, in hooting and hissing out of public life every man who upholds it.

While the pork and beef producers and packers of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, and Kansas pay almost a double price for every barrel of salt they use, the fishermen of New England are furnished with all the salt they consume in curing fish duty free and untainted by taxation. What an outcry of hypocritical horror saluted the Democratic proposition in the Mills bill to put salt on the free-list for all, and yet how complacently the doctrine of free trade in salt has been gulped down when it bestows profits only on a local New England interest, and on no other section!

It is true that the processes of education in political campaigns are slow and difficult with almost the entire body of the American people to reach and consult, but I commend to them once more the instructive lesson of salt, and shall do so again and again in the future until at last it shall be accepted of all that it is naked dishonesty to compel one class of citizens to eat taxed salt in order to enrich another and more favored class.

The next schedule I desire to consider in connection with this bill embraces wool and the manufactured products of wool. The human mind is almost baffled and overwhelmed when it attempts to grasp the widespread and imperious necessity of woolen goods in all their varieties to the human family. From the hour in which our first parents dressed themselves in the garden of Eden until the present time the people of the whole earth have looked to wool and woolen fabrics as a fundamental condition of civilized existence. Woolen clothing has been the accompaniment of civilization wherever it has penetrated and planted its standard of conquest over the forces and the wealth of nature.

The naked or thinly-clad races who dwell under the equator and within the tropics and the torrid zones have not been growers or wearers of wool, nor have they ever belonged to that great procession of human progress which has illuminated the earth, sea, and sky of higher and colder latitudes with the developments of science and the gigantic triumphs of labor. The origin, too, of man's dependence on wool in his struggle for dominion over the powers of the physical universe is very remote, and full of dignity and significance.

The eldest patriarchs of the human family, so far as history discloses, watched their flocks of sheep grazing by day, gathered them into folds at night, sheared them at shearing time, and with wheel, spindle, and loom prepared the wholesome and becoming raiment of a great and powerful people. And thousands of years afterwards when a wonderful light broke from the midnight sky over the plains of Bethlehem announcing the birth of a Prince of the house of David it was first seen by the drowsy and chilly shepherds who were watching and protecting their sheep through the dangers of night and darkness.

Sir, from the very beginning, and at every step, and throughout all the wide regions wherein the strong races of mankind have achieved history worthy of being written, the absolute and unquestionable demand for the universal use of wool has been so commanding and undeniable in general, and so searching and exhaustive in detail, that it would seem as if in comparison with this great staple the very atmosphere by which we are enveloped should be taxed a certain per cent. on the amount we consume in breathing.

From the naked, new-born babe swathed in soft flannel on through every stage of life woolen clothes attend us on our journey. They shelter and protect the persons of young and old, of robust manhood, and of delicate maidens and mothers by day, and warm and comfort their homes and their beds by night. The fire that blazes on their hearthstones is not a greater necessity nor more essential to their comfortable existence, and yet with loud and solemn promises of tariff revision and tariff reduction in the interest of the people still warm on their campaign lips, the leaders of the Republican party are here seeking, with as little discussion and exposure as possible, to increase the duties on wools and woolens to the American people at least $4,000,000 a year.

If any one questions this statement, let the schedule in the bill answer for itself. In its very first line there is an increase from 54.78 to 60.25 ad valorem, almost 6 per cent. added to existing rates, on that class of wool which constitutes practically the entire amount imported into this country. Of this class of wool, costing 30 cents per pound and less, we imported in 1887, 22,607,856.60 pounds, and only 587,878 pounds of all other kinds. The increase of revenue growing out of this increase of duty, every dollar of which the consumer pays, will amount, according to official estimates, to $239,073.89 a year.

On combing and scoured wool of the value of 30 cents or less per pound, and on wool of the value of over 30 cents per pound, embraced in class 2 of the schedule, an increase is made in excess of existing rates of duty of a little more than 4 per cent. ad valorem, and on carpet wool in class 3 the duty is increased about 2 per cent. more than it is now.

But passing from wool in its unmanufactured to its manufactured condition, we find in this bill not only no symptom of reform, but a gross exaggeration of all the worst features of our present vicious system of overtaxed, enslaved labor.

With an overflowing and almost bursting Treasury, surfeited with a surplus of millions, and with an outcry on all hands for a reduction of revenue, it would be intensely gratifying to me to know from the other side of the Chamber why on the manufactures of wools and of the hair of the alpaca valued at not exceeding 80 cents per pound the tariff tax has been raised from 89.84 to 102.66 per cent. ad valorem, an addition of nearly 13 per cent. to an already outrageous burden imposed on the people for the benefit, growth, and power of monopoly. Also I would ask, in view of the condition of our revenues, why the tax duty on woolen cloths valued at above 80 cents a pound has been increased in this bill from nearly 69 to over 73 per cent. (leaving off fractions for convenience), and thereby enhancing the cost of such goods $384,484 per annum to those who purchase and use them in this country?

This bill is a cheat and a fraud in every part and detail of its whole framework. Behold that humble, hard-working woman as she hurries along the street to her daily task, or on her return home, facing the keen wintry wind, and gathering tight about her shivering shoulders her plain, thick shawl, her one staunch friend, her vital protector. Sir, bearded men, and manly men in the world's affairs, where they are free to follow their own good hearts, stand here in this body, coerced by the merciless, unsparing rapacity of the monopolists in manufacture and trade, and demand that the price of that shawl shall be enhanced to that poor struggling woman by a tariff tax increased from 89 to 102 per cent.

The rate of duty as it now exists compels the women, and those who care for them, to pay nearly double the real value of shawls with which to wrap their persons, but the Senate bill, the authorized expression of the Republican party, compels them to pay 2 per cent. more than double. A five-dollar shawl is made to cost more than ten dollars, a twenty-dollar shawl is made to cost more than forty, and a fifty-dollar shawl more than a hundred. Those who are willing to appear as the open, avowed oppressors of women in the matter of their clothing, and take their reward in the hideous embrace of protected avarice, may do so; I will not.

What, however, shall be said as to the article of flannels? Why is it, except for the purposes of legislative plunder and legalized robbery, that on the cheapest manufactures of this great want of mankind the tariff tax in the name of import duty has swollen under the whip of monopoly coercion from 67 to 94 per cent. ad valorem? Over $30,000 a year, in addition to the unjust profits of the existing law, will thus inure to the greedy monopolists in the manufacture and sale of flannels. An increase of 27 per cent. over the existing rate on this one article of universal consumption is something so rank and flagrant in its wrong and oppression that it will go far to educate the people as to the true intent and meaning of tariff revision by the Republican party.

A lesson also on the subject of blankets will greatly assist the public mind in reaching a correct conclusion in regard to what is going on here. On the lower-priced blankets, such as cover the poor man's bed through the long winter nights, valued at between 60 and 80 cents per pound, the duty is raised by this bill from 69.36 to 95.22 per cent. in order to give the American manufacturer an additional margin of nearly 16 per cent. for higher prices, richer profits, and more perfect protection against foreign competition. A pair of blankets rightfully worth $3 are to be put upon the market at $5.85 by protecting the manufacturer from the rivalry of imported blankets to the extent of 95 per cent. I think it will be difficult in the long run to convince plain laboring men and women that this huge tax ought to be allowed to creep into their beds with them, and like a hideous and perpetual nightmare rob them of their rest, and all for the sake of furnishing soft couches, downy pillows, and sumptuous homes to a few protected millionaires.

The head of the household will also, when free from partisan prejudice, wonder why the authors and supporters of this bill have put an additional tax of over 25 per cent. on the common, every-day wool hats which he has to buy for himself and his boys, while the tariff tax on more expensive and pretentious hats worn by rich people is increased less than 1 per cent. In fact, the principle pervading this entire bill in all its parts, and in every detail, is the heavy increase of duty, and consequently of price, on all the cheaper grades of the necessary commodities of life. Thus taxation is raised in every direction on the wants and the purchases of the poorer classes of the people, while high-priced and expensive articles of manufacture consumed by people of wealth are touched but lightly by this bill, or not touched at all.

A glance at "knit goods and all goods made on knitting-frames" in this connection is absolutely startling. It would seem as if the tariff could not be considered for any purpose without arousing the rapacity and greed of monopoly to still further demands and still greater and more vicious activity. On low-priced knit goods, valued at not over 30 cents per pound, the present rate of duty under existing law is equivalent to 88.33 ad valorem. It is now proposed in the bill before us to increase that rate to 258.33 per cent., which, I presume, is intended to be a total prohibition of imports. On knit goods valued at above 30 and not over 40 cents per pound the duty is raised from 65.20 to 145.70 per cent.; on those valued at above 40 and not exceeding 60 cents per pound it is raised from 69.14 to 120.88; on those valued at above 60 and not exceeding 80 cents per pound the increase of duty is from 69.62 to 102.70 per cent., and on all such goods valued at above 80 cents per pound the increase here proposed is from 62.58 to 70.80 per cent., making an average increase of tariff tax of 70 per cent. over existing rates on these five different qualities of knit goods, and yielding out of the pockets of the people $157,845.92 additional revenue per annum to the Government, which is in urgent need of less revenue instead of more in its Treasury.

Sir, a close inspection of this partisan measure discloses at every step its consistent and coherent character as a brutal fraud upon the tax-paying people of the United States, brought forward at the behest of insatiate monopolies, dishonest combines, and arrogant and conspiring trusts. Let us linger a little longer on the wool schedule and point out a few more of its iniquities which are no more respectable than a formed design to commit both grades of larceny, grand and petit. Will some friend of this bill, or substitute, or whatever it may be styled, tell me why it is that the price of woolen and worsted yarns is to be enormously enhanced by an increased rate of tariff tax—on the cheaper grades over 29 per cent., and on the more valuable 4 per cent.?

The duty on the cheapest grade of balmorals is raised from 67.72 to 154.05, on the next grade from 65.59 to 112.74, on the next above that from 68.15 to 100.25, and on the highest grade from 66.25 to 75.11. I assert in the hearing of the Senate and of the country that there is not a single article in this entire schedule on wools and woolens which has escaped an increased tariff tax. The avaricious clutch of the protected monopolist is made still tighter and broader on everything composed in whole or in part of wool; on the clothing of women and children; on their cloaks, shawls, dolmans, jackets, talmas, ulsters, and other garments of similar character; on every description of ready-made woolen clothing, and on every other form or fashion of raiment containing wool known to the wants and uses of the human family. Such a bill is to my mind a bill of abominations.

It presents the revolting spectacle of an increase of taxation and an increase of revenue amounting, according to careful estimates, to $3,842,-681.45 per annum, derived from the highest necessities of human existence, and all to be extorted in a measure of legislation which has for its avowed object a large reduction of taxes in order to prevent a vast surplus from accumulating in the Treasury in the future, as it has done in the past and is now doing.

But before leaving this schedule of wools and woolens I wish to expose one more gross fallacy which has been made prominent recently in tariff discussions. A great deal of noise and vehement pretension has been made in regard to protection to the sheep-growers of the United States by import duties laid on the importation of raw wools from abroad.

A moment's examination will show this proposition to be simply a baited hook thrown by skillful monopoly to the farmers of the country. Let a few plain facts speak for themselves. Take the case of a farmer with fifty head of sheep, which at shearing time yield him 250 pounds of wool. The duty proposed by the bill before us on imported wool of the same grade is 11 cents per pound. If that wool can be sold for 35 cents per pound it will bring the farmer $87.50 all told, $27.50 of which sum will constitute the protection afforded by the 11 cents per pound tariff duty on foreign wool.

What an enticing appearance the well-concealed but well-barbed hook has at this point! But when the farmer in the fall or winter purchases back $87.50 worth of the wool he sold, and of his neighbor's protected wool, now manufactured into blankets, flannels, and clothing of all kinds, he will find himself not only refunding the $27.50 which he swallowed as a most alluring bait, but he will pay in addition all the way from 53 to 258 per cent. ad valorem on every article of woolen goods he is compelled to have, and this enormous plunder of his hard earnings he is coolly informed is for the protection of the manufacturer who has worked his 250 pounds of wool into cloth.

A bill of untaxed goods which he could buy for $87.50, the amount received originally for his wool, will be rendered to him over the counter where he trades at from $125 to $200, according to the articles he calls for. While he is interested and entertained with the comparatively small protection which he receives on his wool, he is at the same time robbed of five times the amount for the benefit of a far different class from himself. While this bill seeks to tickle the farmer's fancy and divert his attention by putting $10 in one of his pockets, the privileged and adroit monopolist will be taking $50 out of his other pocket.

I have been told that there is a game of cards from which the player against the dealer can by no possibility ever rise a winner, but that poor, deluded victim of a bunco-steerer is not more certain to lose or more helpless to obtain fair play than is the farmer as he struggles in the toils and meshes of Republican tariff legislation. The interests of the farmer on the question of free wool and woolen goods were so clearly, simply, and so powerfully stated by the President a year ago that I can not refrain from quoting a few of his admirable sentences—sentences which will live and be repeated in the halls of legislation and in the homes of the people long after we have all passed away. He said:

> The farmer and the agriculturist, who manufacture nothing, but who pay the increased price which the tariff imposes upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears and upon all he uses and owns, except the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation; and he is told that a high duty on imported wool is necessary for the benefit of those who have sheep to shear, in order that the price of their wool may be increased. They of course are not reminded that the farmer who has no sheep is by this means obliged, in his purchases of clothing and woolen goods, to pay a tribute to his fellow-farmer as well as to the manufacturer and merchant; nor is any mention made of the fact that the sheep-owners themselves and their households must wear clothing and use other articles manufactured from the wool they sell at tariff prices, and thus as consumers must return their share of this increased price to the tradesman.
> I think it may be fairly assumed that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small flocks numbering from twenty-five to fifty. The duty on the grade of imported wool which these sheep yield is 10 cents each pound if of the value of 30 cents or less, and 12 cents if of the value of more than 30 cents. If the liberal estimate of 6 pounds be allowed for each fleece, the duty thereon would be 60 or 72 cents, and this may be taken as the utmost enhancement of its price to the farmer by reason of this duty. Eighteen dollars would thus represent the increased price of the wool from twenty-five sheep and $36 that from the wool of fifty sheep; and at present values this addition would amount to about one-third of its price. If upon its sale the farmer receives this or a less tariff profit, the wool leaves his hands charged with precisely that sum, which in all its changes will adhere to it, until it reaches the consumer.
> When manufactured into cloth and other goods and material for use, its cost is not only increased to the extent of the farmer's tariff profit, but a further sum has been added for the benefit of the manufacturer under the operation of other tariff laws. In the mean time the day arrives when the farmer finds it necessary to purchase woolen goods and material to clothe himself and family for the winter. When he faces the tradesman for that purpose he discovers that he is obliged not only to return in the way of increased prices, his tariff profit on the wool he sold, and which then perhaps lies before him in manufactured form, but that he must add a considerable sum thereto to meet a further increase in cost caused by a tariff duty on the manufacture.

But it is constantly urged that wool on the free-list would practically destroy the business of American wool-growing and vastly cripple all the woolen manufactories in this country. Let us first reverse the question, however, and consider briefly whether a high protective tariff on wool has fruitfully multiplied the flocks and herds on whose backs it grows. A few cold statistics on this point will very materially aid the cause of tariff education in certain quarters. Twenty-one years ago the wool-growers and the woolen-manufacturers of the United States formed a combination and secured the passage of the act of 1867 placing a high protective tariff on wool. At the date of the passage of this act there were in the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, 37,864,609 head of sheep, and only 1,127,303 in all other parts of the United States put together. How stands the record now?

In 1867 Pennsylvania had 3,422,002 sheep; she now has 984,981, a loss of 2,437,311, or more than two-thirds of the whole number in the State twenty-one years ago.

In 1867 Ohio had 6,730,126 sheep; she now has 4,106,622, a loss of 2,623,504 in that great State under the influences of high-tariff protection.

In 1867 Illinois had 2,736,431 sheep; she now has 814,177, a loss of 1,922,254, largely more than one-half the number with which she entered the high-tariff combination twenty-one years ago.

In 1867 Michigan had 3,948,191 sheep; she now has 2,113,004, a loss of 1,824,987, or nearly one-half her original number.

The falling off in the sheepfolds of Indiana have been in the same proportion, although I have not the exact figures at hand with which to deal; but the aggregate loss in the number of sheep in all the States east of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers during the last twenty-one years amounts to 19,864,609, while the price of wool itself has fallen from 68 cents a pound in 1867 to 34 cents a pound in 1888, being a destruction of one-half the sheep between the Atlantic Ocean and the great Father of Waters and of one-half the price of the wool yielded by the flocks that remain.

It seems to me that it would hardly be possible for free wool or any other change in the law except a prohibitory tariff to have a more disastrous effect on American sheep-raisers and wool-growers than is here disclosed by the experiences of the last twenty-one years. But all the facts within our reach in regard to manufactured goods from raw material introduced free of duty go to show an increased activity in the manufactories, a stimulated and increased demand, and consequently an increased supply, of the raw material, whether it be wool or any other article.

The experience of the leather and boot and shoe industries of the country for the last sixteen years fully justifies this statement. In 1872 by act of Congress imported hides were placed on the free-list, and it has proved of great advantage both to the manufacturers and to the consumers of boots and shoes and other commodities of leather. I will avail myself of a very instructive statement on this point made by a leading member of the House during its last session, Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois. He says:

> Mr. Switzler, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, has furnished me at my request a table showing the vast increase in those industries (see Appendix No. 1). I call attention also to the fact that the number of pairs of boots and shoes made at the factories in 1870, namely, 80,627,244, was increased in 1880 to 125,478,-511 pairs, and the number of persons employed in the factories increased from 91,702 in 1870 to 111,052 in 1880, being an increase in ten years of over 55 per cent. in the output and an increase of nearly 20 per cent. in the number of hands employed. So much for free hides.
> The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] in his remarks on the 16th day of this month (RECORD, page 6942) submitted some very interesting information obtained from the statistics in reference to the growth of the leather and boot and shoe industries under the stimulating influence of free hides. He pointed out the gratifying fact that the census of 1870 and 1880 showed immense increase in those industries in the ten years covered. In 1870 the capital invested was $126,441,716, and the value of the product was $376,392,211. In 1880 the capital was $149,856,694, and the value of the product was $452,824,925. These statistics embrace the manufacture of all kinds of leather, boots and shoes (including custom work), and saddlery and harness. He further showed that our exports and imports for 1887 of leather and manufactures thereof ($10,000,000 in value each) were about equal to each other, and that our imports of hides in the same year were valued at $24,225,776. In 1872, when hides were put on the free-list, our imports of leather and manufactures thereof amounted to $11,879,000 and our exports to only $3,684,029, and our imports of hides in that year amounted to $14,345,727. Of the $10,000,000 of leather importations in 1887, there was only $553,213 worth of manufactures of boots and shoes. The rest was in leather to be used in manufacturing and in kid and leather gloves.

Such a showing as this on one of the great branches of commerce, manufacture, and consumption will not be lost on those who are honestly concerned in the solution of a most important economic question. It has long been claimed by some among the best thinkers in this country that the importation of raw material for our various manufactories should be made free as far as consistent with a sufficient duty for the revenues of the Government. Here, however, I take leave for the present of the consideration of wools and woolens, simply remarking that Schedule K, which treats of that subject in this bill, may be properly characterized in the language of John Wesley in describing African slavery as the sum of all villainies.

The schedule on the subject of metals presents the same general features of extortion and injustice which pervade the entire measure, with here and there especial discriminations against the less favored communities and classes of the country. The vast burdens already laid by the existing law on the farmer in his use of farming implements and household utensils, and on all others who consume or pay for the use of iron, will be increased by the proposed Senate substitute for the House bill $1,628,086.68, while by the passage of the House bill these burdens of taxation would have been reduced $8,532,302.85. Here is a difference between the two measures of over ten millions, the Republican measure swelling the people's taxes on iron more than a million and a half a year and the Democratic measure proposing a reduction of taxes per annum on the same subject of more than eight millions and a half.

Rates of duty under the law, as it now stands, on all articles manufactured of iron and steel range from 10 to 114 per cent. ad valorem, the dutiable-list showing a larger proportion of such articles as are of the greatest necessity and in most constant use bearing from 70 to 90 per cent. Not only is no relief suggested for such wrongs against the laboring masses, but the most glaring evils are increased and intensified. For the proposed startling increase of duty on iron hoops for baling cotton, or cotton-ties, as they are commonly called, there is not even the excuse of a desire to protect some manufacturer in getting rich out of the daily toil of men and women, white and black, in the South. There is not a cotton-tie manufactured in the United States, and this tremendous leap in the tax on that article appears simply as an unworthy piece of sectional malice, aimed at the great and leading industry of a people laboring faithfully, bravely, patiently, and loyally, and often under the most trying circumstances, to do their whole duty as American citizens.

The Government needs no revenue from that source, and an article so closely allied as cotton-ties to one of the foremost agricultural products of the globe should be made to pay none. A tax on cotton-ties is, of course, a tax on the cotton itself, and while it cripples the producer in handling and getting his cotton to market, it also necessarily enhances the price of manufactured cotton goods to the consumer who at last pays for everything. So, after all, this addition of 73.33 per cent. on cotton-ties, increasing the duty from its present rate of 35 to 108.33, though born of sectional animosity, will be paid as much by the wearers of cotton clothing in the North as by the inhabitants of the South. Whether the authors of such a provision will not, at no distant day, receive the merited condemnation of both sections, and of all parts of the country, can not be a matter of serious doubt in thoughtful minds.

But sectional discrimination in levying taxes is no worse, and perhaps indeed not so thoroughly bad, as to discriminate against the poor as a class by placing the highest taxes on cheap goods, which are alone within their reach, and the lowest taxes on the most valuable goods which are alone used by the rich. Such a policy calls loudly not only for popular indignation, but for that divine malediction which has rested through all the Christian ages on those who grind the faces of the poor.

In illustration of this point, and as an evidence of the unholy spirit running through the schedule of metals as well as through every line and word of the entire bill, I find some valuable facts and figures in a leading New York journal of last week.

The duty under the present tariff upon pocket cutlery—is a uniform rate of 50 per cent. ad valorem. Apart from the liability to undervaluation which is not avoided by the Senate bill, which also includes an ad valorem rate, this is at least no harder on the consumers of cheap goods than on the consumers of more expensive goods. Not so the Senate bill. That proposes a duty of 50 cents per dozen blades and 25 per cent. ad valorem. Here are the results: On knives of one blade costing from 24 cents to $1 per dozen abroad, the duty under the Senate bill ranges from 75 per cent. for the dearest to 233 per cent. for the cheapest. Two-bladed knives costing $1.95 per dozen are taxed at the rate of 76 per cent.; if they cost but $1 per dozen the tax is $1.25; if they cost but 37 cents the tax is 254 per cent., or nearly three times the original cost. On three-bladed knives costing $6 per dozen the tax is only 50 per cent.; if they cost but 43 cents per dozen the tax is 330 per cent. Finally, any one who can afford to buy a pocket-knife that costs $5 abroad will be taxed only 23 per cent., whereas any one who can afford only a knife costing a little over 10 cents in the foreign market must pay 131 per cent. tax, or five times as much as the purchaser who gets a knife sixty times as costly abroad.

Says this writer—

On table cutlery there is the same sort of discrimination against the poor. The popular grades that sell largely are not in fact imported under the present duty of 35 per cent., and could not be even if the duty were but 20 per cent. In reality, some of them are now exported. Yet the Senate committee, under what inspiration Heaven alone knows, has submitted an elaborate scale of mixed duties ranging from 20 cents to $2 per dozen, with a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem in addition. These amount to from 70 per cent. to 110 per cent. for the popular grades, but only 50 to 60 per cent. on the very expensive grades that are purely and simply luxuries. It is the same with breech-loading guns. The fine piece costing within a little of $100 abroad ($97.35) is taxed only 35 per cent., the present rate; the gun costing $13.30 abroad is taxed 100 per cent.; one costing $5.43 abroad is taxed 207 per cent., and if it cost only $3.65 abroad the tax is 303 per cent. This is accomplished by the duty of $10 per gun and 25 per cent. ad valorem. Necessarily, on the cheaper guns this duty is prohibitory. There can not be any excuse for a duty higher than the present one, for even that on guns most commonly made must also be prohibitory, and in this line American makers could beat any others in the world with no duty whatever. Why, then, is this enormous increase, almost tenfold in some cases, desired? It can have but one object, and that is to "protect" not an industry, but a combination, and to prepare for killing home competition by absolutely killing all other.

And now, Mr. President, what is offered in return to the laboring people and poorer classes for the universal invasion of their homes, their wants, and their necessities by these increased exactions and remorseless demands of monopoly? Mr. Lincoln, in one of his characteristic letters, once said that this was a world of compensations. Had he lived to behold the tortuous construction and sinister framework of this bill he would have regarded it as an exception to the general rule. There are neither compensations nor consolations here except what the privileged few find in still further oppressing the humble firesides of the toiling millions.

In the report made by the majority of the Committee on Finance in presenting this bill to the Senate they say:

The demand for a careful and thorough revision of our revenue laws is imperative. This revision is necessary—

First. To reduce the national revenues, which are now excessive. No valid reason can be given why we should, under existing circumstances, continue to collect annually a sum approximating $60,000,000 in excess of the amount required to administer the Government economically and to keep the pledges of public faith.

I will not stop to dwell upon the fact, known to all, that this excessive revenue is of Republican origin; that it has been systematically collected for years by Republican administrations, and that the existence of any excess at all was then vehemently denied by Republican leaders when Mr. Cleveland, a year ago, exposed to the world the condition of the Treasury and the wrongs inflicted on the tax-payers. This open confession, made at last, of a vast surplus in the Treasury, placed there by Republican legislation, shows at least one great point gained in the last twelve months by fearless discussion and a determined defense of the rights of the people. It now stands admitted by the very authors of the injustice that the great body of the American people have been continuously and persistently overtaxed without any legitimate cause.

Another reason is also given by the majority of the committee why a careful and thorough revision of our revenue laws is now imperative. They say in their report that it must be done

To remedy the defects, anomalies, and incongruities which have been from time to time discovered in the tariff schedules or which have been created by erroneous decisions of the Treasury Department.

This plea of confession and of attempted avoidance is almost in the very words of the old broken pledge of tariff reform made by the Republican national convention at Chicago in 1884. It was put in then to bridge over a party crisis by making promises to the ear to be broken to the hopes of the people, and its purpose was still the same when it was put forward again on the 4th of October last here in the Senate. Hypocrisy is said to be the tribute which vice pays to virtue, and these repeated promises of the Republican party, to remedy the defects, anomalies, and incongruities of their own tariff laws, are in like manner the tribute they reluctantly pay to the earnest advocates of real and honest tariff reform.

But for all the evils of taxation, $60,000,000 a year in excess of Government expenses, and as a cure for all the defects admitted to exist in our present system of tariff, the main proposition, and next to the reduction on sugar the only one contained in this bill, is to make whisky and tobacco very cheap for consumption by the men, women, and children of the United States. The consumers of flannels, knit goods, and blankets, taxed a hundred per cent. and more to foster monopolies, trusts, and grasping combinations, are to find their principal relief in chewing cheap tobacco and in drinking cheap whisky.

It is claimed by the majority of the committee that only the internal-revenue tax on alcohol used in the industrial and chemical arts is to be remitted; but it is generally known and was virtually conceded on this floor last session by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that such a remission on alcohol would open so wide the ways to fraud in the liquor business that whisky would practically escape all taxation and become free. The views of the minority of the committee are thus stated on this point in their report:

The substitute relieves the non-necessary, tobacco in all its forms, except cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes, from internal taxation, and gives free alcohol to the arts. Taking the tax off of tobacco will reduce revenue about $24,000,000; and it is estimated that the tax taken from alcohol for the arts will make a further reduction of about $7,000,000. But in view of the impossibility of preventing frauds upon the revenue that should be derived from distilled spirits used for purposes other than the arts, the loss of revenue may be safely estimated at many times $7,000,000.

Practically, the substitute offers to the people free whisky and free tobacco, leaving all the expensive machinery for the collection of the revenue and enforcement of the law in full force, while it increases taxation upon the actual and indispensable necessaries of life, and this, too, when there is a large surplus in the Treasury, and under existing laws that surplus is being increased at the rate of over $10,000,000 per month; thus withdrawing and withholding from the channels of trade, commerce, and business of the country money absolutely necessary to their successful operations.

One merit, however, must be conceded, such as it is, to the Senate substitute for the House bill. It is in substantial agreement with the last Republican national platform laid down in June at Chicago, and while in my judgment that document is one of the worst that ever emanated from an intelligent body of men on the subject of government, yet for the ends of speedy justice I am glad to see a square attempt made to carry out its principles. In that platform it was the declared purpose of the Republican party, in making a reduction of revenue, to repeal the entire system of internal taxation rather than surrender any part of their protective system on foreign imports, and this bill has started with a long stride in that direction.

It ostensibly reduces the revenues derived from whisky and tobacco about $31,000,000, but in reality many millions more, and it is the beginning of the end, now near at hand, under Republican supremacy, when the entire $120,000,000 now annually paid into the Treasury on whisky and tobacco will be wiped out. The people are in need of cheaper clothing, cheaper blankets, cheaper plows, cheaper mowers and reapers, cheaper household goods and kitchen-ware, and cheaper salt. But on such articles as these not only no abatement is made in this bill, but their burdens are largely increased. The fact is that—

The people are groaning under old, huge, grinding war taxes on every necessity of their lives; the Treasury of the United States is running over and bursting open with money sorely needed at home in trade and business, and a curse full of danger and corruption where it is; the privileged few have amassed estates richer than those of the most opulent dukes and earls of Europe, every dollar of which represents unjust taxation and the oppression of labor; and yet in this Christian land and age men sometimes spoken of as Christian statesmen have nothing better than free whisky and tobacco to offer people in response to their cry for relief.

Sir, we have been reminded by Senators on the other side of the Chamber that the people rendered a verdict against tariff reform and in favor of high-tariff protection in the recent Presidential election. I do not admit that Mr. Cleveland's defeat was due to his position on the tariff, nor that a man who is indorsed by a hundred thousand majority of the popular vote of the United States is committed to a weak or a failing cause. The result in November can easily be traced to other influences which may hereafter be pointed out and discussed perhaps in the criminal courts of the country. But suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the cause of equality, justice, and emancipation from financial oppression and servitude did suffer defeat at the hands of the arrogant associated and protected owners of ill-gotten millions, almost beyond the power of figures to estimate, what conclusion is to be drawn from that fact?

Do Senators on the opposite side cherish the delusion that the battle is over? What great work of reformation was ever finished by a single triumph or crushed by a single defeat? There were many verdicts rendered by the American people in favor of the existence of slavery before they rendered their final verdict for a constitutional amendment abolishing it forever. There were statesmen in those days who after every election gravely assumed that the slavery question was settled, and would never be agitated again. But the issue would not down at even their powerful bidding, but continued to rise again and again until not a vestige of that awful source of national contention and bloody strife remains beneath the folds of the flag.

Sir, there was indeed an irrepressible conflict between the North and the South on the question of slavery, but there is at this hour another conflict equally irrepressible between the working millions on the one hand and the protected monopolists on the other, on the question of labor's emancipation from the bondage, the vassalage, the brutal servitude of unnecessary, and consequently unjust and dishonest taxation. Senators may fold their arms in fancied security against the further agitation of the tariff, but their dreams to that effect will be rudely dispelled. The contest for such a reformation of tariff taxation as will afford relief and justice to the laboring masses has but just begun, and it will go on until the colossal powers of the monopolies, trusts, and other unlawful combinations, composing the oligarchy of wealth in this country, are broken, and their heads brought low. The Democratic party desires no better issue than this, and it is ready now and for all time to come to enter into political battle for its success.

For the first time in American history the mask of the manufacturer is thrown aside and all disguise abandoned. He has heretofore at least pretended that all the protection he needed and asked could be secured as an incident to a purely revenue tariff. The greatest minds ever engaged in the conduct of our public affairs have willingly conceded all the incidental protection which wise legislation framed for the purposes of revenue could afford to the domestic manufacturer. The protection, however, now boldly demanded is the enormous tribute which the consumer is compelled to pay directly to the monopolist in manufacture and in trade, no part of which ever reaches the Treasury of the Government at all.

This tribute exacted for the sake of protection per se, and with no reference to revenue, is the increased price which high rates of duty, keeping foreign imports from our shores, enables the manufacturer to put on his goods without fear of foreign competition. This is the naked and avowed plunder of one class of American citizens for the sole benefit and enrichment of another, and it will not long be borne.

The suggestion is sometimes made that the leaders of the Republican party, recognizing the glaring iniquities of the present tariff legislation, will themselves correct them. In the nature of things this can not happen. The Republican party is a mere instrument in the hands of monopoly, and must obey at all times and under all circumstances the dictation of its creator, owner, and master.

In the bitter, sectional times of the past the stinging taunt was often flung at the Northern Democracy that they were submissive to the South in public affairs, that they were dough-faces on the subject of slavery. With infinitely more of truth and justice that taunt can now be returned against the leaders of the Republican party in their servile obedience to every demand of tariff monopoly and protected trusts. They are the dough-faces of a financial slavery as wrong in principle, and often more heartless and cruel in practice, than any other form of human servitude ever known in our midst. Their obsequious submission to the domination of monopoly has also largely and steadily increased during the past few years.

Only a short time ago the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was in favor of a general reduction of duties equal to 20 per cent. on all goods of domestic manufacture, and he was sustained in that position by the report of a Republican tariff commission and the message of a Republican President. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] repeatedly announced that the high duties laid for war revenues were to be but temporary, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] declared with emphasis that the tax on tobacco and spirituous and malt liquors should be retained. Now these distinguished Senators have entirely reversed their positions. A change has come over the spirit of their financial schemes. Protective duties and war taxes are not to be touched except to make them higher, and whisky and tobacco, non-essentials of life, are to be made free.

We behold the greatest leaders of a great party, after a vain endeavor to resist the power, the exactions, as well as the blandishments of organized wealth, now bowing low before monopoly, their patron saint, and acknowledging themselves indebted for their political existence and success to the mighty millions accumulated from the vassalage of labor. And as if to complete this picture of political degradation and triumphant monopoly, the names of those who are known to have contributed most freely of these ill-gotten millions at the late election are now heard mentioned on all hands most conspicuously and favorably for the highest offices and the proudest honors under the new, incoming administration. Sir, the ox loweth over his fodder and the ass brayeth at his master's crib.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on Senate bill 1786 be laid before the Senate that I may submit the conference report on the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Oregon kindly yield to me for a moment to reply to a word or two in the speech of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DOLPH. The report will not take any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is in order. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 19, 1888.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit the conference report on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

J. N. DOLPH,
PHILETUS SAWYER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES PHELAN,
M. D. LAGAN,
CHARLES O'NEILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOLPH. I believe that no action on the part of the Senate is required.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House of Representatives having receded, the bill stands passed. The conference report needs no action on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, and agreed to the same.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. VANCE, in paragraph 177, line 750, to strike out "two" and insert "one and one-fourth;" so as to make the paragraph read:

177. Lead in pigs and bars, glaziers' lead, lead wire, molten and old refuse lead run into blocks and bars, and old scrap-lead fit only to be remanufactured, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have listened with something of interest to the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], not that it contained anything especially new, but because as an effort of the imagination, portraying the suffering and the oppression of the people of the United States, sustained by the pathetic tone and the sounding sentences of the Senator from Indiana, it is really a masterpiece in its way. As a matter of fact I do not know any such people and I do not know any such oppressors, but the oration is excellent nevertheless.

It is amazing to reflect that after all the Senator says about the great abuses of this terrible law, about this wonderful tariff, the Democracy during the last twenty-six years have never passed a tariff bill through Congress, and they never passed one through their own House of Representatives until last July. They have never been able to unite their own members in that House upon a tariff bill. They have not united them this time, for it is known that a few refused to vote for it at the last, and many others wanted to vote against it. That is an amazing fact which I should be very glad to have some Democrat explain.

If this has been, as the Senator says in his florid and exaggerated language, a system of oppression worse than that known anywhere else in the world, worse than even the system of African slavery, why is it that his party, claiming to be the special champion of the people, have never had united courage and sense enough to vote for a tariff bill before last July, one of their own device, but devoted themselves entirely to attacks upon the Republican doctrine?

Among the amusing things in the Senator's speech were some statements like this, for example. I understood him to say that a man who uses $100 worth of salt pays $80 to the Government. I thought I would see how much that man suffered. It becomes a serious question.

Mr. VOORHEES. No, I did not say that. He pays scarcely anything to the Government. He pays it to the trusts and combines and syndicates of Syracuse, and Saginaw, and Kanawha. The money does not get into the Treasury.

Mr. HAWLEY. But what is the sum he pays?

Mr. VOORHEES. Eighty dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. If he uses $100 worth of salt and pays $80 and the Government gets nothing and some robber gets it all, this becomes a serious question. When we take the poor boy who starts to make a living and wants an allowance of salt the problem is serious. So I took my pencil and went to work at it. A barrel of salt, excluding the barrel, weighs, I understand, 280 pounds, and it costs not to exceed 40 cents a barrel. I have just been looking at the testimony of a great dealer, a great authority on that matter. It will cost about 40 cents. Therefore, $100 will buy 250 barrels, or 70,000 pounds. The poor boy can have a pound of salt a day for a little over one hundred and ninety-one years; or we will suppose he does not want as much; we will suppose that he is content with 20 pounds a year, which would be a pretty fair allowance of good salt; the $100 worth will last him thirty-five hundred years, or with a family of five it will last seven hundred years.

The most I can make out that is paid by anybody as a duty on salt, if the whole of the duty is really paid by the consumer, is about 3 cents apiece per annum for the people of the United States.

The Senator was eloquent upon the sufferings of the people by reason of the heavy duty on salt, while at the same time he declared that the Republicans in endeavoring to reduce the very heavy protective duty on sugar were doing it because they were hostile to the South; and it would be quite as fair that I should say that in supporting the present duty he is favorable to the South. Everybody knows that the duty is higher than the Republicans proposed to have it, by reason of the reduction in the price of sugar, wherefore the specific duty becomes a very much higher ad valorem duty than it was supposed when it was fixed that it would be.

The consumption of sugar in the United States is, approximately, 3,000,000,000 pounds a year—say 50 pounds to a person—and the duty upon that amounts to about $1 a person, as against the 3 cents for salt, or from $5 to $6 for the family. That the Senator desires heartily and earnestly, and we propose to take about half of that heavy duty off. The duty was 79 or 80 per cent. ad valorem, I think, in the year 1887. We were told 40 or 50 per cent. duty was enough, being a little discouraged about the prospect of raising all the sugar we want in the United States. I do not give it up yet, but I look to see it come some time or other. However, the duty is larger than the protectionist intended to have it because of the reduction in the price of sugar. Yet the Senator from Indiana would maintain it. These little trifling errors and inconsistencies of his are only equaled by his rhetoric and logic throughout the whole of his speech. The same thing might be said concerning the consumption of other goods, clothing, and so on.

Mr. VOORHEES. If salt is such a trifling thing and is so utterly inexpensive, it is a wonder to me why a large portion of the time of this body and of the House of Representatives has been consumed for I do not know how many years in getting salt free for the New England fishermen. If it is of no consequence to the pork-packers out West, or to the curers of beef, it is wonderful how important it should become to another class of people. I should like very much to see the skill of the Connecticut Senator displayed on that point.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sorry to say that somebody was speaking to me, and I missed the Senator's exact question.

Mr. VOORHEES. I asked why free salt for the New England fishermen is such an important matter if there is nothing in the price of salt; why they must have that always in the law?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is a little trifling bounty thrown in to help the fishing interest, to help retain it to our own people. It amounts to a good deal when you come to put up heavy cargoes of fish, of course.

Mr. VOORHEES. How would it be on heavy cargoes of pork, I should like to know.

Mr. HAWLEY. It amounts to a good deal. It amounts to something when you come to use an immense quantity of it. That is what I said.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is what I thought.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is what I said. It takes considerable salt to supply a family seven hundred years.

Mr. VANCE. I rise simply to ask the Senator from Connecticut another question, if he is not tired answering questions. He made a calculation in which he said that the duty on salt was about 3 cents apiece for the people of the United States. I believe that is correct, is it not?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is as near as I can make it.

Mr. VANCE. If those 3 cents are worth stealing on the part of the salt manufacturers, why are they not worth saving for the consumer?

Mr. HAWLEY. There is where the Senator goes a little too far from the debate. He and his associates charge everybody under the sun with stealing, and I did not stop to discuss the extraordinary theory of the Senator from Indiana, that the whole of the duty on salt went into the hands of the manufacturers of salt.

Mr. ALDRICH. There is one other of the many extraordinary statements which were made by the Senator from Indiana on which I wish to detain the Senate for a moment. He states that the farmer who receives a certain amount of benefit and advantage from the duty on wool is obliged to pay a very much larger sum to the manufacturer of woolen goods, either through the tariff or in some other way, and he states that the cost to the farmer of this tariff upon woolen goods is $250. I suppose he means $250 for his family; I do not suppose he means $250 a person.

Mr. VOORHEES. I suggest in all kindness to the Senator that he had better read my statement after it is printed. I did not make any such statement as that which he attributes to me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will not the Senator repeat what he said on that point?

Mr. VOORHEES. I can not ascertain exactly the point alluded to.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator made the statement all through that while the farmer was benefited by the duty on wool, there was, on the contrary, a disadvantage resulting to him in the heavy duty on woolen goods.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did.

Mr. ALDRICH. And there was a saving of a certain number of dollars on wool.

Mr. VOORHEES. And that he lost a certain number on woolen goods.

Mr. ALDRICH. And the sum fixed by the Senator was $250.

Mr. VOORHEES. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. How much was it?

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not fix any sum. I spoke, for instance, of his getting $87.50 for 250 pounds of wool. The only place where I used the numerals 250 was in regard to the pounds of wool. I said if the wool sold for 35 cents a pound he would have $87.50 for the wool, if he had 50 head of sheep, and he was protected by 11 cents a pound, which would give him $27.50 of protection on his wool, but that when he went to buy that wool back in a manufactured shape, for $87.50 worth of it he would have to pay, according to the article he called for in its manufactured form, from $125 to $200. That was the substance of my statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. VOORHEES. I knew the Senator did.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly understood him to say that the cost to the farmer of the tariff upon woolen goods was $250.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator will see that I am correct about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. We can look into the RECORD to-morrow and see.

Mr. HAWLEY. By the way, before we depart from this subject, I call the Senator's attention to an interesting inquiry, interesting to me, that I made as to the Democratic party. In twenty-six years never before until July did it formulate a tariff bill and pass it through the House of Representatives. Why did they never unite their forces?

Mr. VOORHEES. We have never had at the same time all the branches of the Government, I believe, since the opening of the war. We have never had the President and both branches of Congress at any one time. We have never been in a situation to mature and perfect legislation and make ourselves responsible for it. We have had a majority of the Senate but once in twenty-eight years. We have had the other House a number of sessions, but we have never had that harmony between all the branches of the Government which is necessary to make a party responsible for its legislation. That harmony the party to which the Senator belongs has had and has made itself responsible for the laws of the country.

As to why the members of the House of Representatives have not agreed and harmonized their views, I do not think it a very becoming or important or dignified proceeding between Senators to catechise each other as to the action of gentlemen in the other branch of Congress. I can only answer for myself. I have worked on every tariff bill that came here, and I have done the best I could. I have never seen anything presented by the Republican majority that met my approval. I believe that is about all the answer I have to make.

Mr. HAWLEY. I made no criticism of the individual; I was talking in the broadest sense about the action and responsibility of the party. I understand the Senator, then, to say that unless a party controls both Houses of Congress and the Executive it is not responsible. I am sure that the Republican party has not been able to control both Houses of Congress and the Executive except for two years out of fourteen, and during those two years it did revise the tariff. I am sure that while we have had the Senate the greater part of the time during the fourteen years, we have had the other House but those two years, during which we did pass a tariff bill, and the Republican party in the Senate has been altogether unable to present to Congress a tariff bill because it could not enact a single line of a bill until something came from the other House upon which to found it. By his own argument we are absolved during these fourteen years, and certainly we are justified in saying that the only body which could have originated a tariff allowed twelve of these fourteen years to pass without formulating a bill, and they have done it but once, and did not all agree upon it then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 750, it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "one and one-fourth."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. I was called out of the Chamber by public business, and I do not know what was done as to paragraph 176.

Mr. ALLISON. Nothing was done with it.

Mr. VEST. Was that passed over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed were rejected.

Mr. VEST. I shall not interfere with the pending question, but I wanted to say something in regard to that paragraph of the bill. I was unavoidably absent from the Senate on a public matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed on the question of agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]; otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WALTHALL (when Mr. GRAY's name was called). The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] is paired generally with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). Learning that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has not voted, and as I am paired with him, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his vote.

Mr. CULLOM. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. I will change my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and transfer it to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and thus relieve the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and myself. I vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

178. Lead in sheets, pipes, or shot, 2½ cents per pound.

179. Metallic mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

180. Muskets and sporting rifles, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

181. All double-barreled, sporting, breech-loading shotguns, $10 each, and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that paragraph 181 may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Paragraph 181 will be informally passed over. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

182. Needles for knitting or sewing machines, and tape-needles and bodkins of metal, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. In line 762 I move to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twenty;" so as to make it read "20 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 182, line 762, it is proposed to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Needles for knitting or sewing machines, and tape-needles and bodkins of metal, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

183. Needles, sewing, darning, knitting, and all others not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. I move to strike out, in lines 764 and 765, the words "25 per cent. ad valorem" and insert "shall be admitted free of duty."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 183, lines 764 and 765, it is proposed to strike out the words "25 per cent. ad valorem" and insert "shall be admitted free of duty;" so as to read:

Needles, sewing, darning, knitting, and all others not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. VANCE. De minimis non curat lex is not applicable in this case. The insignificance of an article when the tax is coming in to the manufacturer is dealt upon very largely. Perhaps those Senators who contend that a tax ought to be imposed because it is so insignificant in value would agree, on the other hand, that the tax might be remitted when it is so insignificant to the manufacturer.

If there is any underpaid, half-fed, and overworked portion of suffering humanity in our land it is that class of our unfortunate countrywomen who make their living by sewing, and I see no reason in the world, except a cupidity which grasps at everything, for continuing this tax upon the knitting-needles and the darning-needles and the sewing-needles used by our country women, but every reason why we should give them this little item free of tax, in accordance with the suggestion of the bill for which this substitute is an amendment. Therefore I hope Senators will concur in this proposition, and upon it I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If permitted I should vote "nay."

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). I am paired, subject to the right to vote to keep the Senate in an organized condition, and from appearances I think I may be justified in voting "nay" at the present time. If there appears to be a sufficient number I shall subsequently withdraw my vote. At present I vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT. Has the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. PLATT. I paired with him early in the afternoon, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], who, I understand, is not paired, and I will vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. PADDOCK. By arrangement with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], who is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], that pair is transferred to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. Therefore I vote.

Mr. PASCO. Under the arrangement announced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] I vote "yea."

Mr. VEST. I wish to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I should vote "yea" if he were present. My colleague [Mr. COCKRELL], who is absent on committee work, is paired with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. My colleague would vote "yea" if present.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENNA. I have already announced my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I desire to state now, so as not to be obliged to make the announcement on every roll-call, that the pair is indefinite and applies to all votes.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bate,	Coke,	Pasco,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	Colquitt,	Payne,	Turpie,
Blackburn,	Daniel,	Pugh,	Vance,
Blodgett,	Harris,	Ransom,	Walthall,
Call,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Hawley,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Hiscock,	Palmer,	Teller,
Davis,	Hoar,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dolph,	Ingalls,	Sherman,
Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Spooner,
Frye,	Morrill,	Stewart,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Gray,	Platt,
Beck,	Dawes,	Hale,	Plumb,
Blair,	Eustis,	Hampton,	Quay,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Hearst,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Butler,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Cameron,	George,	McPherson,	Vest,
Chace,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Voorhees.
Cockrell,	Gorman,	Morgan,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

184. Nickel.—Nickel in ore, 5 cents per pound for the nickel contained therein.
185. Nickel in matte, or other crude form not ready for consumption in the arts, 10 cents per pound on the nickel contained therein.
186. Nickel, nickel oxide, alloy of any kind in which nickel is the component material of chief value, 15 cents per pound.
187. Pens, metallic, except gold pens, 12 cents per gross.
188. Pen-holder tips, pen-holders or parts thereof, and gold pens, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
189. Pins, metallic, solid-head or other, including hair-pins, safety-pins, and hat, bonnet, shawl, and belt pins, 30 per cent. ad valorem.
190. Quicksilver, 6 cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out the duty of 6 cents a pound upon quicksilver.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out "6 cents per pound" and insert in lieu thereof "10 per cent. ad valorem." That is the existing law. The duty is taken off entirely by the House bill. I am perfectly willing to accept the law as it stands now, which is 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is great fraud under the present law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 190, line 781, it is proposed to strike out "6 cents per pound" and insert "10 per cent. ad valorem;" so as to read:

Quicksilver, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VEST. The import price, according to the list of exports and imports for 1887, is 41.9 cents per pound, and at 10 per cent. ad valorem under the existing law this made the duty 4.19 cents on the pound. Under the Senate bill it is proposed to make this duty 6 cents per pound, which is an increase of 42 per cent. over the present duty. What reason can be given for an increase of this sort I am utterly unable to understand. In the House bill the duty was taken off altogether, and I move now to put it back to the existing law, which is 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. VEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VEST. I simply want to say, in addition to what I have said, that for 1887 the exports of this article were $241,952 in value and for 1888 they were $531,128, or an increase of $289,176. So it can not be said that this is a languishing industry or interest, but on the contrary it seems to have taken care of itself so well as to have increased in one year in the value of exports $289,176.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If permitted, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). My pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] having been transferred to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], I vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN]. I do not see him present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. My colleague [Mr. COCKRELL] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bate,	Coke,	Ransom,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Daniel,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Blodgett,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,

Chace,	George,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Gibson,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Vest.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

191. Screws, commonly called wood-screws, more than 2 inches in length, 5 cents per pound; over 1 inch and not more than 2 inches in length, 7 cents per pound; over one-half inch and not more than 1 inch in length, 10 cents per pound; one-half inch and less in length, 14 cents per pound.

Mr. VANCE. In line 787, I move to strike out the word "fourteen" and insert the word "twelve;" so as to make the bill conform to the existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 787, it is proposed to strike out "fourteen" and insert "twelve;" so as to read:

One-half inch and less in length, 12 cents per pound.

Mr. VANCE. I should be glad to ask the Senators in charge of the bill why the duty on screws of this number alone is raised 2 cents a pound.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is done for the purpose of equalizing the rate upon each size of screws. If the Senator will read the whole paragraph he will find that we have reduced the rate upon two sizes and allowed it to remain where it was on one and increased it upon one slightly. The ad valorem is only 44.59 per cent. on this size as compared with 61.17 on the size over 1 inch and not more than 2 inches in length.

Mr. VANCE. Why was the duty of 44 per cent. or its equivalent not satisfactory? Why should this description of screws be raised? Is it more difficult to make than the others?

Mr. ALDRICH. Very much more difficult and very much more expensive.

Mr. VANCE. More labor in it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Very much more labor.

Mr. VANCE. Then those 1 inch and less than 2 inches long are too high, because that size is at 53.52 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. We have reduced those.

Mr. VANCE. But you have not reduced them in proportion. If you want to do justice, do justice to the consumer as well as to the manufacturer. If there is more labor in those less than an inch than there is in those an inch and less than 2 inches, of course the one with the most labor ought to have most, and the other with the less amount of labor, less expensive to make, ought to have the least duty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I would vote "nay" but for the fact that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] or I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. BECK], who is absent on account of sickness, with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is also absent.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. PLATT. The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] being detained from the Senate on business of the Senate, I am paired with him.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Coke,	Pugh,	Vance,
Berry,	Daniel,	Ransom,	Voorhees,
Blackburn,	Harris,	Reagan,	Walthall,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

192. Silver-leaf, 75 cents per package of five hundred leaves.

193. Cut tacks, brads, or sprigs, not exceeding 16 ounces to the thousand, 2½ cents per thousand; exceeding 16 ounces to the thousand, 2½ cents per pound.

194. Type-metal, 1½ cents per pound for the lead contained therein; new types, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VEST. I move to strike out "1½ cents per pound," in line 794, and insert "15 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 194, line 794, it is proposed to strike out the words "1½ cents per pound" and insert "15 per cent. ad valorem;" so as to read:

Type-metal, 15 per cent. ad valorem for the lead contained therein.

Mr. VEST. Under the existing law the tariff tax or duty is 20 per cent. ad valorem. This is an increase to 50 per cent. There is no interest in the United States which is more absolutely prosperous in every regard than that of the manufacture of type. We have the finest foundries in the world. No other country can excel this and no other country can compete with it. In all the range of our commercial enterprises or of our American industries, there is no department of manufacture that to-day not only is self-sustaining but pays larger profits or is in a more prosperous condition than that of type-founding.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. About 90 per cent. of this type-metal is lead, and a small amount of it—I do not remember exactly—is copper; and very little type-metal is imported. Our type manufacturers manufacture their own metal. If, however, type-metal comes in at a lower rate or a substantially lower rate than lead, of course type-metal will be imported as lead, and the copper and antimony or whatever it is will be extracted from it. That is all there is in this paragraph.

Mr. VANCE. Has that been the case? Have there been any frauds alleged upon the revenue by the importation of lead in the shape of type-metal?

Mr. ALLISON. Very largely, and, if the Senator will pardon me, it is not type-metal at all, but it is lead that has been imported nominally when it was really type-metal.

Mr. VANCE. Is there any report of that from the Treasury Department? I ask for information. Have complaints been made by anybody? Have any officials represented that such frauds are being perpetrated?

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand it, those in charge of this class of examinations have stated substantially what I have said, that under this 20 per cent. ad valorem duty type-metal is imported as lead and not for the use of type manufacturers. Our type manufacturers make their own metal.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, we are proceeding at so rapid a rate that I am unable to find my references. I examined into this question, however, and I was unable to find any sort of excuse for this increase of duty. On the other hand, I undertake to say that there is entire satisfaction on the part of the manufacturers of type in the United States in regard to the present condition of the business.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think they care anything about it, for, as I have said, they manufacture their own type-metal.

Mr. VEST. Then why should we increase the cost of an instrumentality of knowledge? We ought to make it as cheap as possible. We do not need the revenue, and I can not conceive of any sort of reason, except merely the exercise of the power of amendment or change, that justifies this legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that this matter was brought to the attention of the subcommittee by the experts of the Treasury Department, who stated to us that frauds of this nature were constantly being committed; that metal was imported as type-metal which was simply a mixture containing 95 per cent. of lead alloyed with some other metals which could be easily removed.

I must confess my admiration for the heroic disinterestedness of the Senator from Missouri when he, being from one of the largest lead-producing States in the Union, proposes, not a duty of 15 per cent. on type-metal, but a duty of 15 per cent. on the lead contained therein, while the duty on lead itself is 50 per cent. ad valorem. It would admit lead to an unlimited extent under the name of type-metal if it is put at the ad valorem of 15 per cent. on the lead contained in the metal.

Mr. VEST. I do not think it would do any such thing, and I have been unable to find, outside of the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island, any evidence of the fact that these frauds now complained of have been committed. As a matter of course, if he says that experts stated it to his committee, I take no issue on that, for I have no knowledge on the subject.

As to my heroic disinterestedness, I will attend to that. I will face my constituents on this subject, and will simply say I am asking no sort of advantage for the people of Missouri. I want to cut down these tariff duties, and if it operates against any interest in my State justly, I am in favor of that legislation, and I will take that responsibility, and I would rather leave public life than not be able to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri should recollect that a few years ago a similar bill made statuary free. It was thought not to be wise to levy a tax on art. Thereupon there came within a year immense cargoes of leaden statues of Washington, Franklin, and all the great men of our country, free of duty, merely to import the lead contained in those molds. The same trick has been practiced over and over again. Wherever you levy a duty on a raw material you have to levy a corresponding duty on every article composed of that material, otherwise you could not have the tariff correctly levied. That particular case excited the attention of Congress, and it was promptly corrected, and I think one of the Senator's predecessors took part in correcting the error.

Mr. VEST. I can turn in a few moments to a speech made by the martyred President, James A. Garfield, which is a complete answer to the Senator from Ohio. General Garfield was told in the House of Representatives once, when a member of that body, that it would not do to touch any item in the tariff because they all stood or fell together, and he made an eloquent and convincing reply, saying he, for one, would never consent to that doctrine or act upon it as a public man. But again and again we are told here, "You must not touch one hair upon this sacred animal of the high protective tariff; if you de-range one single schedule, take down the duty upon a single article, you destroy the whole system," and my friend from Maine who sits in front of me now [Mr. FRYE] would stand here and proclaim that "liberty lay bleeding in the streets" if we undertook now to pass a bill upon our Calendar that admits to American registry a few vessels built with American capital abroad and owned by citizens of Philadelphia. Why? Not that he objects to a few vessels, eight or ten vessels, being put on the registry, but it is the "principle;" you must not break down a single particle of the protective system. Now, we are told by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Ohio, "Here is a duty upon lead, and you must have a corresponding duty upon type-metal because 90 per cent. of it is lead," and so throughout the whole system, one duty supporting and arguing for another, and where are we to commence any reform in this monstrous system of unjust taxation, as we proclaim and believe it to be?

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest to the Senator that he might commence to reform it by moving to reduce the duty on lead.

Mr. VEST. I voted for it, and I will vote for it again, and I have the largest lead-mine in the State of Missouri or in the world, of a capacity producing 3,000 pigs of lead per day, the St. Joseph lead-mine, and, together with the Doe Run mine in the same ownership, employing in the neighborhood of fifteen hundred men. I will go there to-morrow and make the same speech I now make in this Senate Chamber. They must stand their just reduction with other interests, and if they are honest men they will stand it. I am not here to ask for any special favors, but I am here to fight all sorts of exclusive privileges that are in my opinion unjust and detrimental to the public interests.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHACE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], or I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently, forgetting for the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. So I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. In making my pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] I reserved the right to vote if my vote should be necessary to make a quorum. It appears to be necessary, and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. TELLER. I understand there is a quorum without my vote. Therefore I withdraw it. I also announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bate,	Coke,	Payne,	Turpie,

So the amendment was rejected.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

195. Zinc or spelter.—Zinc in blocks or pigs, 1½ cents per pound.
196. Zinc in sheets, 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. VANCE. I see that that is an increase on zinc in blocks. I move to strike out "one and three-fourths" and insert "one and one-half," which is the present law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 798 it is proposed to strike out "three-fourths" and insert "one-half;" so as to read:

195. Zinc or spelter.—Zinc in blocks or pigs, 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Rhode Island has alluded especially to the lead interest, and as I did not happen to be in the Senate when the debate came up on that item, though I arrived in time to declare my pair, I want to read the testimony taken before the House committee on what is known as the Morrison bill by the principal lead-owner in the State of Missouri, one of the principal proprietors of the St. Joe lead-mine, in Southeast Missouri, the mine to which I referred a few moments ago.

He states that the yield of that mine is between eight and nine thousand tons of lead per year, and as zinc and lead are intimately connected and come out of the same mines, I want to read his testimony now to show the operation of this tariff system, this tax upon raw material—for it is nothing else—upon lead and zinc under the pretense of helping the poor miners who are the objects of such extreme anxiety on the other side of the Chamber. Now, sir, Mr. Jones—and I ask attention to this because it illustrates in the highest degree the oppression of this system—was then attacking the Morrison bill. He says:

It puts the miner of this country on a par with the miner of a foreign country. But at the same time every tool and implement and every piece of material with which the miner works he has to pay a duty on. For instance, a miner can not work without powder, and the duty on powder is 45 per cent. If he does not use foreign powder he has got to pay a duty upon the saltpeter and sulphur used in the domestic powder. He has got to use English steel drills, which pay a duty of 45 per cent. He has got to use wire ropes, which pay a duty of 1½ to 3 cents a pound, depending on their size. He has got to use tracks under ground and to pay a duty of $18 a ton upon rails. He has got to use iron cars made up of plate-iron, and wheels, the duty on the plate-iron being $30 a ton and on the wheels 2½ cents a pound. He has got to use iron pipe and chains and anvils. There is not a tool nor an implement with which the miner works, nor any material which he uses in mining, that he is not compelled to pay a duty on, and therefore he is to that extent working at a disadvantage as against the miners of the old country. It seems to me a very gross injustice and a want of equality towards the laboring man of this country.

I call attention to that statement by the largest lead-mine owner in the State of Missouri for the reason that he knows the practical operation of this law, and he answers the theoretical argument made here again and again and which confronts us upon every portion of this protective system, that this duty does not come off the consumer. He says it does come off these miners, that when they pay this tariff duty upon the instruments of their labor it comes out of their pockets, and he protests against it. That is the operation of the tariff; and when we increase the duty upon zinc or upon lead, do we help the miner? We help the mine-owner. Enormous profits are made in the production of lead—enormous profits. It is true they have built up towns in my State. It is true that to-day they give employment to a large number of people; but when we come to the miners, the labor element, this gentleman testifies that the burden is still kept upon them, whilst the profit goes into the pockets of their employers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. VANCE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VANCE. There is a request on my left that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 798 it is proposed to strike out "one and three-fourths" and insert "one and one-half;" so as to read:

Zinc in blocks or pigs, 1½ cents per pound.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the roll-call will proceed on agreeing to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If permitted, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] or I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CHACE. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I desire to say that I shall not announce the pair again to-day. I announce it now for the day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (after having voted in the negative). I see that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON] is not in the Chamber. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws his vote.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. TELLER. If it is necessary to make a quorum I shall vote, as I reserved that right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The name of the Senator from Colorado will be called.

Mr. TELLER. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Coke,	Payne,	Vance,
Berry,	Daniel,	Pugh,	Walthall.
Blackburn,	Harris,	Reagan,

Colquitt,	Gray,	Plumb,
Cullom,	Hale,	Quay,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote disclosing the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Palmer,	Stewart,
Berry,	Frye,	Pasco,	Stockbridge,
Blackburn,	Hale,	Payne,	Teller,

Blodgett,	Hawley,	Plumb,	Vance,
Call,	Hiscock,	Pugh,	Vest,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Cullom,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Iowa.
Davis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sawyer,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his call for the yeas and nays, as a majority has voted against the amendment.

Mr. VANCE. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the call for the yeas and nays, and the Chair announces that the amendment is rejected. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

197. Zinc, old and worn out, fit only to be remanufactured, 1½ cents per pound.

198. Manufactures, articles, or wares, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, composed wholly or in part of iron, steel, lead, copper, nickel, pewter, tin, zinc, gold, silver, platinum, or any other metal, and whether partly or wholly manufactured, 45 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the last line read, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of line 806 it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no article mentioned in this schedule shall pay a higher rate of duty than 90 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the amendment is offered because of the fact that the great majority of articles taxed by this schedule have specific duties imposed upon them, and as prices fluctuate very often, the duty is thrown out of all proportion to the value of the thing upon which it is imposed. For that reason I offer the proviso to come in at the end of the schedule.

Mr. ALDRICH. In so far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee might lead the country to believe that there were any number of articles in this schedule upon which a duty of 90 per cent. ad valorem was levied, I desire to enter a disclaimer. But the effect of the amendment now offered by the Senator from Tennessee would be to oblige the appraising officers of the customs at every port where any article in this schedule was entered to ascertain the value and to ascertain whether the rate imposed was 90 per cent. or not. It would lead to inextricable confusion; and not only that, but it would very largely increase the expense of collecting customs, especially the expense of collecting customs under this schedule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Without any adequate return.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without any adequate return, and without any good to any one so far as I can see. For instance, take pig-iron, where a duty is fixed under this bill and has been for a great many years at a specific rate. It would be necessary for the appraising officers at each of the ports to ascertain the value and the correctness of the value of every ton of pig-iron which would be imported under the bill. It is an impracticable amendment, if I may be allowed to say so, with all deference to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Take the article of cutlery, for instance, that has not been disposed of as yet in Committee of the Whole. There is a specific duty upon a dozen knives, for example, costing a dollar or less. The dozen knives that cost a dollar and the dozen knives that cost 20 cents pay precisely the same rate of duty. In some instances, perhaps, in the schedule the specific duty imposed is lower, and the cheaper classes of goods upon which this duty is imposed would amount perhaps to 200 or 300 per cent. At all events, it is a very great inequality to compel the article worth only 20 cents to pay the same amount of tax or duty that the article which is worth a dollar pays.

In respect to the necessity of finding the value of all the articles in this schedule at the custom-house, that certainly can not be necessary under the provisions of the amendment as to any but a comparatively small class of articles. Where the tax imposed makes it probable that the ad valorem equivalent to the specific duty imposed would exceed 90 per cent., I grant that the value would have to be ascertained in order to determine whether it did or did not exceed that rate; but with regard to perhaps seven-tenths or nine-tenths of the articles dealt with in this schedule no investigation would be necessary to determine the question that the duty did not exceed 90 per cent.

Certainly there can be no revenue necessity, nor can there be any reasonable protective necessity, for requiring any article upon which the duties are imposed by this schedule to pay a higher rate of duty than 90 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that we defer action upon his amendment until the cutlery provisions which the committee will present to the Senate shall have been considered.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that course being pursued.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then if the Senator still finds it necessary in his own mind to have a provision of this kind he can make it apply simply to those paragraphs of the schedule where he wishes to limit the duty.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to allowing the amendment to remain unacted upon until all the provisions of the bill have been considered and finally acted upon by the Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be passed over, and the reading will proceed.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the consent of the Senate to pass over informally Schedule D and Schedule E. The committee perhaps will have some amendments to suggest and propose to these two schedules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa to pass over Schedules D and E informally?

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is his purpose to return at this time to those paragraphs of Schedule C that have been informally passed over or to proceed with the other schedules of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. My idea is to proceed with the other schedules in the bill and not to return to any of the paragraphs passed over until we have finished the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. VANCE. I was going to suggest that I should be glad if the Senator from Iowa would say definitely on this evening or on any evening what is to be considered the next day, so that those of us who may have occasion to prepare can obtain the information necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. That was my object in making the statement to-night. The schedules to be considered next will be Schedule F, tobacco, and Schedule G, provisions. We can go on regularly with the schedules to-morrow morning. At the request of some Senators who have other engagements——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask again if there is objection to passing over Schedules D and E?

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, there is no objection. We are willing to comply with the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. At the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 20, 1888, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate the 19th day of December, 1888.

TERRITORIAL CHIEF-JUSTICE.

Thomas Burke, of Washington Territory, to be chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Washington, vice Charles E. Boyle, deceased.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate December 18, 1888.

POSTMASTER.

Mrs. Belle P. Chreitzberg, to be postmaster at Georgetown, in the county of Williamson and State of Texas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 19, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MORRILL, until January 7, 1889.

To Mr. ROWLAND, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GRANGER, indefinitely.

To Mr. WASHINGTON, for the balance of this week, on account of important business.

TO MAKE INDIANS CITIZENS.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, introduced (by request) a joint resolution (H. Res. 243) to constitute Indians and Indian tribes citizens of the United States to the extent only that they may sue and be sued; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGES, ETC.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday morning the Chair laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting an account of expenditures on account of international exchanges, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, but no order was made to print, and, if there be no objection, that order will now be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GEAR. I rise to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate; and agree to the same.

R. W. TOWNSHEND,
LEVI MAISH,
JOHN H. KEAN,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House, under the rule, submitted the following accompanying statement:

Statement of managers on the part of the House to accompany the conference report on bill H. R. 2579.

The managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, after full conference, have agreed to the amendment of the Senate. The Senate amendment strikes out the words "brigadier-general," in the sixth line of the bill, and inserts in lieu thereof "colonel of cavalry."

It was thought by the managers on the part of the Senate that the bill as it passed the House authorized the President to appoint Andrew J. Smith a brigadier and to retire him with the rank of colonel. The amendment is agreed to, to avoid any possible difference of construction by reason of the phraseology of the bill. The amendment does not affect the bill as it passed the House in regard to the rank in which General Smith is to be placed on the retired-list.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GEAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the report of the committee of conference which was under consideration yesterday afternoon. The question is on agreeing to the report, the report and the statement of the House conferees having been read yesterday.

Mr. PEEL. I ask that that be passed over for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MRS. ELIZABETH D. SCOTT.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the special order, the bill to increase the pension of Mrs. Scott.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, is it competent to raise the question of consideration against that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 944) increasing the pension of Mrs. Elizabeth D. Scott.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I raise the question of consideration against that bill. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that I do this with a view of calling up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. STEELE. This bill has been going over from time to time, and I wish to have it considered now. Under the order there are only fifteen minutes allowed on each side for debate, so that it can not consume much time, and I should think it would really save time to dispose of the bill now. I have no disposition at all to waste time in connection with the bill, but the case is a very meritorious one and ought to be disposed of.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. STEELE. To-morrow the Territorial bill will come up. This bill will take but a very short time, and we had better dispose of it now.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It will take half an hour.

Mr. STEELE. Well, if there is no disposition on the part of those opposed to the bill to debate it, our side will not consume any more time than the few minutes that may be necessary to explain it.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now proceed to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] whether this is one of the bills which are on a special calendar and which came out of the Committee of the Whole with the previous question ordered on them?

Mr. STEELE. It is.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I think, sir, that the House should proceed at some early day to consider all the bills that are on that special calendar, which have all come over in the same way, with the previous question ordered; but if they will not do that now, I hope they will take up and pass this bill for the increase of Mrs. Scott's pension.

Mr. STEELE. There is no other bill that I know of in just the same condition as this, except one which comes after it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no desire to antagonize the bill of the gentleman from Indiana, but I feel constrained to raise the question of consideration against it in favor of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the House will consider this bill for this poor lady.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. This question is not debatable. The question is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of this bill?

The question was taken; and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the House will proceed to consider this bill, as the case is a very meritorious one and ought to be promptly and favorably considered.

Mr. STEELE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 42.

Mr. STEELE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. KILGORE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the consideration of this bill is the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is the special order.

Mr. KILGORE. Did not the House yesterday refuse to consider it, and did it not by reason of that fact lose its place?

The SPEAKER. It did not. As the Chair stated yesterday morning, the bill had been postponed; and when it came up yesterday the House refused to proceed with its consideration, but it did not lose its place as a special order.

The House again proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANCHARD (during the count by tellers). Mr. Speaker, as probably the quickest way to get rid of this bill is to let it go through, I withdraw the question of consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I renew it. We have a dozen such cases.

After the tellers had proceeded for some time with the count,

Mr. MCMILLIN said: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am willing that the bill be considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], not the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], made the point that no quorum voted.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw it, if the question of consideration is withdrawn.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not understand the question of consideration to be withdrawn.

Mr. BLANCHARD (to Mr. MCMILLIN). Do you withdraw the question of consideration?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Oh, no.

The tellers resumed the count; but before the result was announced,

Mr. STEELE said: I ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on this bill on Friday next at 3 o'clock.

Mr. SPINOLA. I object. If the gentleman will name 2 o'clock for the vote I will not object.

Mr. MATSON. I object.

Mr. STEELE. I modify my proposition so as to name 2 o'clock.

Mr. MATSON. I still object.

The tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 78.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. On this question the tellers report ayes 56, noes 78. The House determines not to proceed at this time with the consideration of the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. By an order which the House adopted on Monday last, the bills with reference to the admission of Territories were made a special order for yesterday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and to continue from day to day until disposed of. At a meeting of the Committee on Territories this morning I was instructed by a unanimous vote of that committee to notify the House that the committee will ask the House to consider those bills on Tuesday, January 15; and they will not be called up until that time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why this sudden cessation of activity?

Mr. SPRINGER. This is the unanimous wish of the committee, there being no politics in it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the first move, then, in which there is no politics.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. HAYES. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOOKER. Is it understood that any order was taken by the House upon the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] in regard to considering the Territorial matters?

The SPEAKER. No order was necessary; an order has been made heretofore.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood that by an order adopted on the day before yesterday the consideration of these matters with reference to the admission of the Territories was made a special order for yesterday; and yesterday the chairman of the committee, as I understood, announced that he would not call the matter up until to-day. I want to know whether it is not within the power of the House to take up those measures now, and why it should not be done?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, any gentleman can call up the matter for consideration, and the House will determine whether it will proceed to its consideration or not. At present the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES] is on the floor to present a privileged report.

CLERKS TO SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HAYES, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House bill No. 8059, having had the same under consideration, approve the purposes of the bill and think such relief should be given to Senators and Representatives in Congress; but the same purpose has been covered by House bill 6095 and with more detail, and which seems to be proper, if not necessary, to properly effectuate its purposes; and so we recommend a substitute for House bill 8059, the substitute being House bill 6095, with slight changes, so as to read as follows, and recommend the passage of this substitute:

"A bill to authorize the appointment and prescribe the compensation of clerks to Senators and Representatives who are not chairmen of committees.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the approval of this act each Senator and Representative and Delegate in Congress, who is not the chairman of a committee which is allowed a clerk, shall, during the sessions of Congress only, be entitled to a clerk, to be appointed and paid as follows, to wit: Such Senator may at any time after the beginning of each session, as soon as the committees are announced, nominate to the Secretary of the Senate such person as he desires to be his clerk, and thereupon said Secretary shall enroll the name of such nominee in a record-book, to be kept for that purpose, showing the full name of such person and the State or place from which appointed, with the date of the same. Such Representative or Delegate may, at any time after the beginning of each session of Congress, nominate to the Clerk of the House of Representatives such person as he desires to be his clerk, and thereupon the Clerk of the said House shall enroll the name of such nominee in a record-book to be kept for that purpose, showing the full name of such person and State or place from whence appointed, with date of same.

"SEC. 2. That the aforesaid clerks shall be paid out of the contingent funds of the respective Houses as other employés of the Senate and House of Representatives, but only for the time they are actually present and in the service of the Senator or Representative by whom they are respectively nominated, each at the rate of $100 per month; and such clerks shall be removable at the pleasure of the Senator or Representative at whose instance the appointment is made."

As to this substitute the committee adopts the report made to the last Congress upon a similar bill, being Report 3905, Forty-ninth Congress, second session, as follows:

"[House Report 3905, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred House bill 10078, having had the same under consideration, report the same back to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

"The bill gives a clerk to each Senator and Representative who is not the chairman of a committee entitled to a clerk. At the beginning of each Congress and as soon as the committees are announced, each such Senator and Representative is required to name his clerk. Those named by the Senators are to be enrolled by the Secretary of the Senate, and those named by the Representatives are to be enrolled by the Clerk of the House. They are to be paid as other employés of the two Houses are paid, and at the rate of $100 per month during the time they are actually present and serving. It is believed by your committee that the passage of the bill is necessary to relieve members of Congress from a drudgery which prevents them from devoting a good portion of their time to the study and preparation of such measures as they have to act and vote upon. How often are members of this House called to vote upon the most vitally important measures without ever having had time to read the bill or the report of the committee thereon, much less an opportunity to study and compare such measure with former legislation touching the same subject.

"One of the reasons which influenced the committee was the adoption of a resolution by the Senate some years ago allowing each Senator (not chairman of a committee) a clerk. At each session of Congress since then the Senate has put an amendment on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill providing for paying those clerks, and the House, after a fruitless resistance, has each time been forced to assent thereto. Senators' clerks now receive the same per diem compensation as clerks to committees. The bill herewith reported proposes to establish uniformity and equality as between Senators and Representatives as to clerks and their compensation.

"It is believed that honest and capable young men can be found in every Congressional district throughout the Union who would gladly accept the position of clerk to his Senator or Representative for $100 per month during the sessions of Congress, which is the compensation proposed by this bill.

"With six great Departments, comprising more than a score of bureaus, and the large amount of business which requires of members a daily visit to some of them, the large number of Government publications, the seed of various kinds which it is the right of the people to have distributed among them, pensions and patents to be looked after, which, with the answering of the letters received by any member of Congress, will require the whole time of any one man, and he who does it properly will find all of his time fully occupied in its performance. A Senator or Representative who devotes his time to these duties will have none to spare for legislation. One of these must be neglected, or the Senator or Member must employ a clerk at his own expense, and this is a hardship in many cases.

"Many of the Representatives and some of the Senators, especially from the Southern States, are poor men, and can not maintain a family in Washington on a less salary than that now allowed by law. It is not to the interest of the public at large that poor men of a high order of talent should be driven out or kept out of Congress through the meagerness of the salary, and thus the business of legislation be entrusted to the millionaires and men of wealth. Such a course would be as fallacious as very high salaries would be inconsistent with the genius of our Government. The bill under consideration does not in any sense increase the salaries of members, for under its provisions they have nothing to do with the payment of the clerks, nor can the latter receive any pay except for time employed and service actually rendered.

"Your committee are of opinion that the services of a clerk to a member of Congress would be more valuable to that member's constituents than to the member himself. Would not the people of any Congressional district prefer to present methods that there should be paid out of the United States Treasury $100 per month while Congress is in session, to some bright, active young man, to aid their Representative by giving prompt attention to their business with the several Departments, and promptly answer their letters, etc., thereby securing to the member time enough to read and study closely the various important matters of legislation before Congress? Twenty-five years ago there was no necessity for such assistance, but the growth of the country in population and business has been very great, and with it the Departments and bureaus of the Government have, not always wisely perhaps, correspondingly multiplied. Then three thousand bills was a large aggregate of the number introduced during a Congress, while now more than four times that number are printed and referred to appropriate committees during each Congress.

"Under this bill clerks to Senators would receive but $100 per month, whereas at present they receive $180, being the same as received by committee clerks, and with much less labor to perform. This reduction in the amount paid Senators' clerks would, upon an average per session, reduce the expenditure about $15,000. The total expenditure under this bill would amount in the aggregate to about $240,000 per Congress of two sessions, or an average of $120,000 per annum, which at the most would not exceed the present outlay in that direction more than $100,000 per annum. It is also believed that the passage of this bill would greatly diminish the competition for chairmanships of committees. A large number of the standing committees of the House (at least twelve) could well be dispensed with, and the present necessity for additional committee-rooms in the Capitol would thereby be averted. A majority of your committee are therefore of opinion that the bill ought to pass. It is deemed just to state that this report is not the unanimous voice of the committee."

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, this measure, I presume, is subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that it must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken; the bill, under the rules, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. How does this matter come before the House?

The SPEAKER. This bill was introduced and referred by the House to the Committee on Accounts. It provides for the payment of the salaries of the proposed clerks out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. But how does this come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The point of order that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is well taken.

Mr. HAYES. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is it in order to make a point of order against that?

The SPEAKER. It is not, but the House may refuse to agree to the motion.

Several MEMBERS. Division.

Mr. SPRINGER. As a test vote on this proposition I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The yeas and nays were ordered, more than one-fifth voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 95, nays 108, not voting 120; as follows:

So the House refused to go into Committee of the Whole.

During the roll-call the following pairs were announced:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for ten days from to-day

Until further notice:

Mr. ROWLAND with Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. WASHINGTON with Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. BACON with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES with Mr. PATTON.

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. SHERMAN.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. FULLER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. MCCORMICK.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. WHITE, of Indiana.

Mr. DOUGHERTY with Mr. HUNTER.

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. BELDEN.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri, with Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky.

Mr. COTHRAN with Mr. CROUSE.

Mr. RICE with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. ROCKWELL.

Mr. WILKINSON with Mr. FUNSTON, for one week from December 17.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. WILLIAMS, for this day.

Mr. ENLOE with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, for this day.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. LONG, on this vote.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, with Mr. ATKINSON, on this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HAYES. I ask, by unanimous consent, to withdraw the report for the time being.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let it be recommitted.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. HAYES. I wish to ask the Chair whether this report will retain its privileged character and come up hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers not to decide that question until it is presented. The Chair will examine it.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course, then, the motion to lay upon the table is not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, and ask unanimous consent at the same time that members having reports to make may hand them in at the desk.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair in reference to this request before it is granted. The Committee on the District of Columbia want to submit a report on a resolution looking to an investigation regarding certain purchases of real estate in this District, and I would like to know if it can now be considered by the House.

The SPEAKER. It can not except by unanimous consent, and the regular order has been demanded by several gentlemen.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana as to the filing of reports?

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

ABANDONED HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 11620) to allow persons who have abandoned or relinquished their homestead entries to make another entry, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRON BRIDGE, FORTRESS MONROE, VA.

Mr. MAISH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9067) for the construction of an iron bridge from the military reservation at Fortress Monroe to Elizabeth City County, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-SHIP, SANDY HOOK, NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. CLARDY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11683) for the establishment of a light-ship with a fog-signal at Sandy Hook, New York Harbor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably a House miscellaneous document in relation to the purchase of real estate in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF PROPERTY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1092) for the relief of certain property in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 3136) to amend section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to fugitives from justice; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL-DELIVERY STAMPS.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 11794) to amend the postal laws of the United States in reference to letters bearing special-delivery stamps; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO WEST POINT, 1887.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back a House resolution to print 5,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors for 1887 to the United States Military Academy; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNIFORMS OF ARMY OF UNITED STATES.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably a joint resolution (H. Res. 182) to print 3,000 sets of plates illustrating the uniform of the Army of the United States from the organization of the Government to the present time; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELECTION FRANCHISE.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 11866) to preserve the purity of the election franchise; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the hour for the consideration of bills, which begins at two minutes before 1 o'clock.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask unanimous consent that the second morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. SOWDEN. I object.

Mr. PHELAN. I wish to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has announced that the hour for the consideration of bills has begun, but that order will be recalled, and the gentleman will submit his report.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. PHELAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments.

JAMES PHELAN,
M. D. LAGAN,
CHARLES O'NEILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOSEPH N. DOLPH,
P. SAWYER,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. There is no statement accompanying this report as required by the rule.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a verbal statement, as this affects only one feature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will submit a verbal statement.

There was no objection.

Mr. PHELAN. The bill as reported from the committee of the House was the same as it came from the Senate, but when it came up for consideration in the House the following amendment was adopted:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect the rank of promotion of any officer originally appointed before the adoption of the regulations of 1879; and the President is authorized to nominate for confirmation the officers in the service on the date of the passage of this act.

That amendment was added, as I have said, in the House. Its operation would be to except the Supervising Surgeon-General from the operation of the act, and make him again liable to a new appointment. Upon the information received by the conference committee we came to the conclusion that it would be unjust and unfair to the officer now holding this position to adopt the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. And that is eliminated from the report?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes, sir.

The report was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry. In case I withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, does the call rest with the Committee on the Militia when the hour for consideration is next reached?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If I caught the statement of the Chair, made in response to the gentleman from South Carolina a short time ago, the Chair stated that the regular order had been demanded. I want to know if it is the regular order to dispense with the morning hour or to proceed with it?

The SPEAKER. To proceed with it; but the gentleman from Illinois has asked unanimous consent to dispense with it.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills for one hour, the hour beginning at three minutes past 1 o'clock.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to submit a request on behalf of the gentleman from New Jersey, the chairman of the Committee on the Militia, who is necessarily absent from the city, and who has charge of the bill which would come up for consideration in this hour, the bill creating a military force for the District of Columbia. He is necessarily detained from the Capitol, and I ask in his behalf that the call proceed with the next committee, reserving the right to his committee to be called hereafter.

The SPEAKER. But the regular order is insisted upon by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope, in view of the necessary absence of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], who has made this request of me, that there will be no objection to permitting his committee to be passed over on the call to-day, reserving its hour to be used hereafter.

Mr. TAULBEE. I shall not object to that, of course, if it is requested by the gentleman from New Jersey, provided the regular order is proceeded with.

The SPEAKER. The request does not dispense with the hour, which will be occupied by another committee.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then I do not object.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the Committee on the Militia will be passed over, retaining its hour.

The Committee on Patents was called.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions was called.

Mr. MATSON. I think there is in this hour some unfinished business that would necessarily come up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call up any business unfinished, or any new business of a public character that has not been heretofore considered.

Mr. WEAVER. I was temporarily absent from my seat when my committee was called, and I ask unanimous consent that it may retain its place in the call.

Mr. DIBBLE. I shall object to that, unless the same privilege be granted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WEAVER. That is right, and I hope that committee will also be permitted to retain its call.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that the Committee on Patents and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may retain their places in the call, not to lose the time to which they are entitled under the rule?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF PENSION LAWS.

Mr. MATSON. It has been agreed in my committee that in this hour the bill increasing the pension for deafness shall be first called, and subsequently a bill providing that persons who have served in the Confederate army and afterwards enlisted in the Navy might be put upon the same footing as those who enlisted in the Army, which by some oversight was not included when the bill became a law.

I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4953) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MATSON. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know more about the bill before that is done.

The SPEAKER. The bill can be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MATSON. That is not the bill I desire to have considered; I will find the bill. The bill that I spoke of is not on the Calendar. I thought it was reported.

The SPEAKER. Then it can not be taken up under the rule, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be passed over for the present, not to lose its place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES MADE BY MARYLAND AND VIRGINIA.

Mr. LANHAM (when the Committee on Claims was reached). I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 1521) to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia, which is now on the Calendar.

I move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee for the consideration of a bill the title of which has been read.

The bill was read in full, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the accounts of the State of Maryland for advances made to the United States in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of Maryland passed the 19th of December, 1791, entitled "An act concerning the Terri ory of Columbia and the city of Washington," for the purpose of aiding in erecting public buildings at the permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and to allow interest on the amount found to be due the State from the 1st day of January, 1843: Provided, however, That any sum of money due by the State of Maryland to the United States shall be deducted from the amount found due to the State of Maryland.

SEC. 2. That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the accounts of the State of Virginia for advances made to the United States in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of Virginia passed the 27th of December, 1790, entitled "An act concerning an advance of money to the Government of the United States for public buildings," for the purpose of aiding in erecting public buildings at the permanent seat of the Government of the United States, and to allow interest on the amount found to be due to the State of Virginia from the 1st day of January, 1850: Provided, however, That any sum of money due by the State of Virginia to the United States shall be deducted from the amount found due to the State of Virginia.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the treasurers of the States of Maryland and Virginia the amounts found to be due them, respectively, under the provisions of this act out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW], who reported this bill from the Committee on Claims, and who is more familiar with it than I am.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the chairman of the committee [Mr. LANHAM] before yielding the floor permit a question? Is this the same bill that was in the Committee on Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress, and as to which the views of the minority were presented?

Mr. LANHAM. My recollection of the bill is that it was considered by that committee in the Forty-ninth Congress. I am not positive whether a report was made or not. It is the same bill, I am informed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. BUCHANAN. And that there was great diversity of opinion in the committee as to its merits.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield the floor.

Mr. SHAW. I should like to have the first seven pages of the report which I send to the Clerk's desk read, and if gentlemen will give their attention they will see upon what basis this claim rests.

The Clerk read as follows:

The subject-matter of this bill has been before committees of Congress since the year 1850, and from the records of committees of the two Houses of Congress there appear to have been made the following reports:

September 16, 1850. Thirty-first Congress, first session, H. R. Report No. 494, by Mr. Daniel, from Committee on Claims.

May 29, 1850. Same Congress and session. From the Senate Committee on Claims, by Senator Underwood.

January 6, 1852. Thirty-second Congress, first session, H. R. Report No. 2, by Mr. Rantoul, from Committee on Claims.

January 30, 1852. Thirty-second Congress, first session, Senate Report No. 59, by Mr. Brodhead.

1853. Thirty-third Congress, first session, H. R. Report No. 278, by Mr. Kerr, from Committee on the Judiciary.

Also by Mr. Geyer.

May 20, 1884. Forty-eighth Congress, first session, H. R. Report No. 1563, by Mr. Mayberry, from Committee on the Judiciary.

February 13, 1886. Forty-ninth Congress, first session, H. R. Report No. 518, by Mr. Shaw, from Committee on Claims.

February 7, 1887. Forty-ninth Congress, second session, Senate Report No. 1787, by Mr. Mahone, from Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

This committee has again examined the reports, documents, and state papers, as well as contemporaneous history, and having collated from the private diary of the late Hon. William Maclay, a Senator from Pennsylvania in the first Senate of the United States Congress, in 1789, 1790, and 1791, all the facts relating to the subject, it believes that a correct understanding of the reasons which influenced the location of the public buildings on the Potomac entitles the States of Virginia and Maryland to the relief provided in the bill. That history is briefly but correctly set forth in the report of the House Committee on Claims of the Forty-ninth Congress, which report this committee again submits as embodying all the facts, reasons, and arguments which induce it to recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

[House Report No. 518, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

During the Revolution the Congress assembled in places which were rendered available by the varying circumstances of the war then being waged. Philadelphia, Lancaster, and York, in Pennsylvania; Princeton and Trenton, in New Jersey; Annapolis, in Maryland, and New York City were severally honored by the meetings of this assemblage. Before the treaty of peace Philadelphia became and continued the seat of government until June, 1783. The mutiny of the Pennsylvania line on account of arrearages of pay compelled an adjournment of the sitting of Congress to Princeton, N. J. The causes which led to this sudden and unexpected adjournment of the Federal Congress from its established seat made the subject of a Federal capital a fruitful source of discussion, continuing through the period intervening from 1783 to 1790. On the 7th of October, 1783, Mr. Gerry, then a member of the House of Representatives, gave definite shape to the discussion by proposing that the Federal buildings be provided on or near the banks of the Delaware or Potomac River, with a vested right in the soil and exclusive jurisdiction for all governmental purposes in the Government of the United States. The proposition of Mr. Gerry received the approval of Congress at that time, but no definite steps were taken to further conclude the matter. On April 25, 1784, the action of Congress approving the proposition of Mr. Gerry was repealed without the assignment of any special reasons therefor.

On the 30th of October, 1784, three commissioners were appointed by Congress to select and lay out a Federal district for the purposes of the Government, near the falls and on either side of the Delaware River. The commissioners were authorized and empowered to purchase the land and to erect the necessary public buildings thereon. On account of the failure of Congress to make an appropriation, the purposes contemplated in the act creating the board of commissioners were not carried into effect. On the 13th of February, 1785, an effort was made to substitute the Potomac for the Delaware River as a proposed site, which effort finally failed.

On the 10th day of May, 1787, Mr. Lee, of Virginia, introduced a resolution providing for the erection of public buildings in Georgetown, on the Potomac. This resolution, like its predecessors, failed of adoption. The Constitution, adopted in 1787, provided for a Federal district not exceeding 10 miles square for the permanent seat of government. Action was not taken to give effect to this provision of the Constitution until the 23d of December, 1788, when Maryland passed an act to cede to the United States a district of 10 miles square, the act leaving with Congress to decide where the exact site should be selected.

On the 3d of December, 1789, the State of Virginia passed an act for the cession of a district 10 miles square, and suggesting the selection of a site on the Potomac River where "the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia may participate in such location." (Davis's Laws, District of Columbia, page 60.)

No action was taken by Congress upon either of these acts until September 5, 1789, when a resolution passed the House of Representatives establishing the seat of government on the Susquehanna River. In the debates which ensued on that resolution the word "Susquehanna" was struck out and that of "Germantown" inserted. This resolution, which then took the form of a bill, passed the House, but failed to pass the Senate.

On the 31st of May, 1790, a bill was introduced in the Senate "to determine the permanent seat of Congress and the Government of the United States." Baltimore, Georgetown, Patapsco, and Havre de Grace were mentioned as desirable places for the capital of the country. But finally the act establishing "the temporary and permanent seat of government for the United States" was passed July 16, 1790, fixing the banks of the Potomac River as the most desirable site. In compliance with this act, President Washington visited Williamsport, Washington County, Maryland, but not liking the situation selected the present location, and upon his report the act of March 3, 1791, was passed, amending that of July 16, 1790, and authorized the President to include Hunting Creek and the town of Alexandria in the Federal district. Thus the present District of Columbia was located.

It is shown by an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, passed December 3, 1789 (13 Henning, page 33), that the establishment of a "situation for the seat of the General Government, central and convenient to the citizens of the United States at large, having due regard to population, extent of territory, and a free navigation to the Atlantic Ocean through the Chesapeake Bay, as well as ready communication with our fellow-citizens on the western frontier," engaged the attention of the said General Assembly, and on the 10th of December that General Assembly passed the following:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Virginia, That a copy of the foregoing act of the 3rd of December, 1789, be transmitted to the General Assembly of Maryland without delay, and that it be proposed to the said Assembly to unite with this Legislature in an application to Congress that in case Congress shall deem it expedient to establish the permanent seat of government of the United States on the banks of the Potomac so as to include the cession of either State, or a part of the cession of both States, this Assembly will pass an act for advancing a sum of money not exceeding $120,000 to the use of the General Government, to be applied in such a manner as Congress shall direct towards erecting public buildings, the said Assembly of Maryland on their part advancing a sum not less than three-fifths of the sum advanced by this State for the like purposes." (See Journal of the House of Delegates, page 115.)

The foregoing resolution was prepared and introduced into the General Assembly of Virginia by Hon. John Marshall, then a member thereof, and afterwards Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

At the November session, 1790, the General Assembly of Maryland passed the following resolution:

"Whereas by a resolution of the General Assembly of Virginia, passed on the 10th day of December, 1789, it was proposed to the General Assembly of Maryland that the General Assembly of Virginia will pass an act for advancing a sum of money, not less than $120,000, to the use of the General Government, and to be applied in such manner as Congress shall direct, toward erecting public buildings, the Assembly of Maryland on their part advancing a sum not less than three-fifths of the sum advanced by the said General Assembly of Virginia, which resolution came so late to the last General Assembly of Maryland that it could not be acted upon, and was, therefore, referred to this present session; and

"Whereas this General Assembly doth highly approve of the object of said resolution and is desirous of doing everything required on the part of Maryland for carrying the same into effect, on a second reading of said resolution,

"Resolved, That this house doth accede to the proposition contained in said resolution of the Assembly of Virginia, and will advance to the President of the United States, for the purposes mentioned in said resolution, the sum of $72,000, payable to his order in three equal yearly payments."

On the 24th of December, 1790, the General Assembly of Virginia passed the following—

"Act concerning an advance of money to the Government of the United States for public buildings.

"Whereas the General Assembly of Maryland have acceded to a proposition of the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, contained in their resolution of the 10th day of December, 1789, concerning an advance of money to the General Government to be applied towards erecting public buildings at the permanent seat of the Government of the United States, should the Congress deem it expedient to fix it on the bank of the Potomac; and

"Whereas Congress has passed an act for establishing the said seat of Government on the Potomac:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That $120,000 shall be advanced by this Commonwealth to the General Government, payable in three equal yearly payments, and to be applied toward erecting public buildings at the permanent seat of the Government of the United States on the bank of the Potomac, and the auditor of public accounts is hereby directed to issue his warrants on the treasurer to the amount of $120,000, payable, in the manner hereinbefore directed, to the order of the President of the United States." (See 13 Henning, page 125.)

The records of the treasury department of Virginia show, by certified copies, that the first payment of this advance to the United States was made April 15, 1791, and the last on January 8, 1795, and making, on the whole, the sum of $120,000. And by the eleventh section of the act of Maryland, passed December 19, 1791, it was—

"Resolved, That the treasurer of the Western Shore be empowered and required to pay the $72,000 agreed to be advanced to the President by resolution of the last session of Assembly, in sums as the same may come to his hands as the appointed funds, without waiting for the day appointed for the payment thereof." (See Davis's Laws District of Columbia, page 70.)

At the same time, to secure the prompt payment of the sum advanced, the treasurer of the Western Shore was authorized to sell the "reserved lands to the westward of Fort Cumberland," and also "the lands lying in Dorchester County, and now in the possession of the tribe of Choptank Indians; to sell and convey the right of this State to 100 acres of land at Fort Frederick, in Washington County." (See volume 2, Scharf's History of Maryland, page 566.)

In the act of neither State is allusion made to the site of the seat of Government being a necessary condition of the advance of money, except as may be inferred from the use of the words "in case Congress shall deem it expedient to establish," etc., and these would have included and applied to the proposed location, which embraced Pennsylvania as well as Maryland and Virginia.

It is an established fact of history that very deep feeling was engendered in the discussion leading to the location of the seat of Government. The question became largely sectional, and at one time threatened to lead to a rupture of the Union. To ward off such deplorable consequences a location was sought at a point which would be considered central to territory and population, accessible to navigation, and convenient to the western frontier.

No contemporaneous authority has been produced or can be found which intimates that the Congress was influenced by the advances of Virginia and Maryland in locating the permanent seat of Government on the Potomac, nor can any line of history be shown that "in the then impoverished condition of the country a pecuniary argument of this sort" had any "influence on the question of location" of the capital.

Chief-Justice Marshall, writing the life of General Washington (volume 5, chapter 4, page 259), says:

"At length a compact respecting the temporary and permanent seat of government was entered into between the friends of Philadelphia and the Potomac, whereby it was stipulated that Congress should adjourn to and hold their session in Philadelphia for ten years, during which time the buildings for the accommodation of the Government should be erected at some place to be selected on the Potomac, to which the Government should remove at the expiration of the term.

"This compact having united the Representatives of Pennsylvania and Delaware with the friends of the Potomac in favor of both the temporary and permanent residence which had been agreed on between them, a majority was produced in favor of the two situations, and a bill was brought into the Senate in conformity with the previous arrangement, and passed both Houses by small majorities. This act was immediately followed by an amendment to the bill then pending before the Senate for funding the debt of the nation. * * * When the question was taken in the House two members representing districts on the Potomac, who in all previous stages of the business had voted against the assumption, declared themselves in its favor, and thus the majority was changed."

Not one word is said about "a pecuniary argument." Chief-Justice Marshall's authority is selected because of all the public men of the times he best understood the motives underlying the action of Virginia in the matter of these advances. He had been a member of the Virginia house of delegates from 1788 to 1793, when these advances were proposed. He knew that the title of the act making the advance had been amended on final passage by changing the word "grant" to "advance," and his professional eminence at that early day precludes the supposition that he would in a public statute use the word "advance" to convey a gift or donation.

The location of the Federal capital at its present site was the "sugar plum" which Mr. Jefferson said was given to the South for their adoption of the "assumption bill," which was a "bitter pill" to those States, and that it was necessary that some one consistent measure should be adopted to sweeten it a little to them. (Jefferson's Works, volume 4, page 448.)

The present location of the Federal capital was a compromise settled upon higher considerations than would be involved in any advance of money which Virginia and Maryland could have offered.

In the fourth section of the act of July 16, 1790, authority was given to the President to accept "grants of money," to be used in defraying the expenses of purchasing the site and erecting public buildings thereon. And it is contended that to this acceptance of grants his authority was clearly limited. It is further contended that the authorities of Virginia and Maryland were presumed to know and understand the provisions of this law; and it is further insisted that, despite the use of the word "advance," the moneys paid over by these States to the Government of the United States were paid in consideration of the location of the seat of Government at this point, assuming that from the present location benefits would accrue to the neighboring States sufficient to constitute a valuable consideration for their offerings.

As to the first objection, that the President was authorized to accept grants of money only, we may appeal with confidence to the words of President Washington in explanation of his understanding of the authority conferred upon him and of the action of the States in the premises. In a letter addressed to the Commissioners of the Federal District, written from Philadelphia under date of August 29, 1793, President Washington asks:

"In what manner would it be proper to state the account with the States of Virginia and Maryland, they having advanced money which has not been all expended on the objects for which it was appropriated?" (Letter on file in the State Department and cited in Report H. R. 494, Thirty-first Congress, first session; and in Report 5, Thirty-second Congress, first session.)

From this clause there is a clear inference that President Washington regarded this money as an advance, rendering necessary an account of it to be kept with those States.

It will not be seriously contended that the receiver of another's money will be permitted to assume the character of a beneficiary when by the express terms under which he has been made the receiver a contrary intention is expressed.

While it is contended that it was the duty of the States to know the authority conferred upon the President to accept grants only, it may be contended with like force that it was the duty of the Government and its agents to take notice of the nature and provisions of the grant as expressed in the public acts of the States, and in which they have carefully guarded their rights in the premises.

Again, Congress having failed to carry into effect the prior resolutions, establishing the seat of government, solely on account of its poverty and consequent inability to make the necessary appropriations therefor, it may be fairly urged on behalf of the claimants that the money advanced to the use of the Government was intended to avoid a repetition of previous failures. In confirmation of this intention to advance or lend, and not to grant their moneys, the historical fact is urged on behalf of the State of Virginia that an offer was made by the General Assembly of Virginia on the 28th of May, 1783, in the following words:

"That if the honorable Congress should esteem the city of Williamsburgh a fit place for their session, the Assembly will present them, on their removal thereto, and during their continuance therein, with the palace, the capitol, and all public buildings, and 300 acres of land adjoining the said city, together with a sum of money not exceeding 100,000 of this State's currency."

To this resolution is attached the following proviso:

"Provided, always, That should Congress thereafter remove from the city of Williamsburgh, or from the land mentioned, that in such case the land so ceded, with the buildings, shall revert to the Commonwealth."

It seems that this clearly demonstrates that when Virginia intended a present, she so expressed herself, and that when her intention was only to advance money to the use of the Government, she was equally guarded and explicit in her language. The journals of the house of delegates clearly show that the use of the word "advance" was with peculiar deliberation, for one of the last acts in the final adoption of the act was to amend the title by substituting the word "advance" for the word "grant," thereby causing an agreement between the title and the body of the act. The act of the State of Maryland follows strictly that of Virginia.

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the use of the word "advance" as contained in these several acts and resolutions; it has but one interpretation, which is that of a right of reimbursement. To interpret this word as used in the resolutions of Maryland and Virginia as originating a gift is forced and extraordinary. It is clearly used as implying and anticipating an accounting between the parties, and familiar instances of its use in this relation in commercial transactions will readily occur to the mind. It may tend to throw light upon the intention of the States in the premises to refer to the system of raising revenue prior to the adoption of the Constitution, which was by requisition upon the several States; and, although that system had been superseded by the mode now in use, yet it was at a period so very recent after the adoption of the present mode that habits and ideas growing out of the former system would still have their force and effect. How natural was it, then, that in making a loan to the General Government the States of Virginia and Maryland should make use of terms to which they had become familiar under the Government which had been so recently changed.

The advance of $192,000 by Virginia and Maryland enabled President Washington to begin the actual construction of the public buildings, which gave a value to lands theretofore valueless. The building of the Capitol converted a wilderness into city lots, the proceeds of the subsequent sales of which enabled the commissioners to continue the work on the public buildings until 1798, when the first appropriation from the Federal Treasury was available.

In a letter to Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State, dated March 31, 1791, General Washington says:

"The terms entered into by me on the part of the United States with the landholders of Georgetown and Carrollsburg are that all the land from Rock Creek along the river to the Eastern Branch, and so upwards to or above the ferry, including a breadth of about 1½ miles, the whole containing from 3,000 to 5,000 acres, is ceded to the public on condition that when the whole shall be surveyed and laid off as a city (which Major L'Enfant is now directed to do) the present proprietors shall retain every other lot; and for such part of the land as may be taken for public use for squares, walks, etc., they shall be allowed at the rate of £25 ($66.67) per acre, the public having the right to reserve such parts of the wood on the land as may be thought necessary to be preserved for ornament; the land-holders to have the use and profits of all the ground until the city is laid off into lots and sale is made of these lots, which by this agreement become public property. Nothing is allowed for the ground which is occupied as streets and alleys." (See Sparks, volume 10, page 147.)

Mr. Jefferson, replying under date of April 10, says:

"The acquisition of ground is really noble, considering that only £25 an acre is to be paid for any ground taken for the public, and the streets not to be considered, which will in fact reduce it to about £19 per acre." (Varnum, page 27.)

In the report of Thomas Munroe, superintendent of public buildings, dated February 27, 1816, and embracing the receipts and expenditures in relation to the public buildings from 1791 to 1816, the moneys advanced by Virginia and Maryland are carried into the general accounts of receipt, with appropriations from the Federal Treasury and with the proceeds of the sales of lots and other property. In the report of the Committee on Public Buildings, made to the House of Representatives on February 16, 1820, the following language is used:

"Before closing their report the committee think it proper to observe that in so far as the public buildings have advanced, the unexpected expenses of their repairs, since their conflagration, inclusive, the appropriations heretofore made, and to be made, until they are completed, can only be considered for the most part as advances made at the Federal Treasury, which will be reimbursed by the sale of the public property in the city of Washington, which has cost the Government but little. At the time of the cession of this property as the seat of Government, it, the property, was considered as a source of revenue which would be amply sufficient for the erection of the public buildings, and if the document herewith presented, marked D, is not unreasonable, it will yet be sufficient to complete such as are undertaken. But for their destruction there is no doubt of the correctness of the calculation made many years since of the sufficiency of the funds for its object."

Document D, referred to, concludes that—

"If this expectation should be realized it will appear that the public buildings have been erected from the proceeds of property created by locating the seat of Government in this place, and that a fund will remain for further improvements."

Mr. Meigs, in a report from the Committee on the Expenditures upon the Public Buildings, made to the House of Representatives March 21, 1820, remarks that—

"It appears that the valuation of the public lots and actual amount of sales, added to the donations from the States of Virginia and Maryland, exceed the national expenditure upon public buildings by nearly $400,000." (See American State Papers, volume 11, Miscellaneous.)

Thus it appears from reports of commissioners and committees that the Government has realized more from the sales of lots than it paid from the Treasury, as well as a large sum in excess of the amount advanced to its use by the States of Virginia and Maryland.

The land obtained by President Washington would have remained of little value but for the action of Virginia and Maryland advancing $192,000, which gave a fixity and permanence, by actual construction of the public buildings, to the national capital, and imparted to the wilderness the quality of city lots. This $192,000 not only started the public buildings, but it also augmented the value of the public property obtained from the land-holders, by making the construction of the public buildings certain, which, without that action by these States, could not have been begun, as the Congress had not appropriated any money for the public buildings. In this double light, first, of enabling the commissioners to go on with the public buildings, and, secondly, of the value imparted to the city lots, must the action of these States be reviewed. So far from being a mere selfish act to secure the benefits of adjacency to the Federal capital, this advance by these States was the means of making valuable the whole property acquired by President Washington for the Government. The site of the capital on the Delaware had been abandoned for want of money to commence the public buildings. A like fate overhung that on the Potomac, and would probably have overtaken it had not Virginia and Maryland furnished the first money that gave impetus and life to the young capital.

It is inconceivable that any two States of the Union would, for nearly fifty years, by joint resolutions of their General Assemblies, unanimously adopted, persistently instruct their Senators and request their Representatives to urge upon the Congress the payment of an improper claim.

The General Assembly of Maryland, by joint resolution in 1842, and by the testimonials of her agents in 1832, and by joint resolutions of February 20, 1878, and again by joint resolutions of 1882, and the State of Virginia by joint resolutions of 1850 and subsequently, have urged upon the Congress the payment of these advances.

It is not possible that Legislature after Legislature in two States from 1842 to 1884 could have been so constituted as not to have contained a single member in either house who would not have questioned and denied the right of the States to a return of this money if the law and the facts of history had not, in the opinion of the Legislatures of these States, fully established these transactions to have been advances, and not grants, gifts, or donations. It is contended that these States have slept upon their rights in the matter of their claims; but it must be remembered that the Government has not always been in a condition to meet these demands, not being out of debt until 1837, and it can be justly urged that the Government, being the recipient of the favor, should have made the first movement towards its repayment.

The long delay, the very "staleness of this claim," is consonant with the very spirit of the transaction and with the very essence of an advance. These States designed that the infant Government of the United States, then without money or credit, should enjoy the use of their money so long as the United States was burdened with debt and unable to repay without embarrassment. In that spirit no demand for repayment was made while the Revolutionary debt and the debt of the war of 1812-'15 were unpaid. The first surplus of any amount in the United States Treasury was reported in 1836, and was distributed that winter; the panic of 1837 so prostrated all kinds of business that only three-fourths of the surplus was distributed; the remaining fourth never was distributed. There was no surplus again reported until 1841, and Maryland made her demand in 1842 and Virginia in 1850. Thus early these States instituted steps for the collection of these advances; their applications have been favorably considered by committees of the House and Senate, and upon two occasions bills for their relief have passed the Senate, but failed to be reached in the House.

The Government has neglected its duty in this regard, and the States, after a lapse of nearly half a century, and embarrassed in their own financial affairs, and when in the mean time the Government had become prosperous and wealthy, sought and have been constantly seeking to reclaim these advances. In a transaction marked with such patriotic devotion, it was not unbecoming in the States to wait long and patiently in expectation that the money advanced would be tendered without the embarrassment of a demand.

The States of Maryland and Virginia now, through their respective Legislatures, request the repayment of their advances, and by such request have placed a construction upon the acts of their States which it would be unjust and ungrateful for the Government as a beneficiary to reject or deny.

During the reading,

Mr. SHAW. I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and if no gentleman desires to be heard I will now ask that the committee report the bill back to the House favorably.

Mr. KERR. I do desire to discuss the pending proposition and to offer some amendments.

Mr. SHAW. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KERR. I will take the floor when you get through. I wish to say——

Mr. SHAW. I will yield to the gentleman such reasonable time as he may desire if he will state what time he wants.

Mr. KERR. There are a number of gentlemen on this side of the House who desire to be heard in opposition to this bill. As far as I am personally concerned I would not want over ten minutes, but I know of three or four gentlemen who desire to be heard in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SHAW. I have no intention or desire to repress discussion on this bill. I only wish to retain the floor. I will yield ten minutes if you desire it.

Mr. KERR. I wish to make a few remarks in opposition to certain features of this bill, and then there are other gentlemen who desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield the floor?

Mr. SHAW. I yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. KERR. I would like the entire time allowed under the rule, because I wish to occupy ten or fifteen minutes myself, and other gentlemen desire to speak on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be entitled to the floor if the gentleman from Maryland yields the floor.

Mr. LANHAM. The gentleman from Maryland desires to retain the floor, but is perfectly willing to yield any reasonable time for the discussion of the measure.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would suggest that if the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SHAW] is prepared to proceed, that he proceed, or that he yield the floor.

Mr. SHAW. I am perfectly willing to yield such time as gentlemen may want for the discussion of this measure; but I desire to retain the floor.

Mr. KERR. We would need the entire hour. I will say that there are other gentlemen on this side desiring to be heard on the bill.

Mr. SHAW. I can not yield all the time I have.

Mr. KERR. You can discuss it till you get through.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a suggestion? There are many gentlemen on this side of the floor that are not, perhaps, positively opposed to this bill, but who oppose it when an important bill relating to an ancient claim against the Government is brought in here, and the gentleman in charge of it, instead of presenting reasons why the House should adopt it, proposes hastily to move the previous question. I will suggest to the gentleman, for my own part, that I will, probably, be far more willing to support this bill if it were discussed. We have heard the report, and learn that there is a radical difference of opinion in regard to the merits of this bill. Whatever there is in that, there can be no doubt as to the point that it is an ancient claim.

It may be a just claim as well as an ancient one, but in such a case as that the gentleman who advocates the bill should take the burden of proof and consume at least a part of his time in endeavoring to persuade the House to vote for the bill, and I am sure that the opposition to it is only increased by his declination to argue in favor of it himself.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] that the portion of the report which was read by the Clerk so succinctly sets forth all the facts in connection with this claim that I thought it would be satisfactory to every gentleman who heard it. This claim is for money advanced by the States of Maryland and Virginia for the erection of public buildings here in Washington. It is an historical fact, which I presume no gentleman will attempt to gainsay, that the State of Maryland advanced $72,000 and the State of Virginia $120,000 to the National Government for that purpose, and that neither of those States has ever been reimbursed for those advances. They come here now, it is true, after the lapse of many years, asking the National Government to reimburse them for the advances thus made, and it seems to me, sir, that it is a claim based upon every principle of fairness, of justice, and of equity. The question may arise, and doubtless does arise in the minds of many gentlemen, "Why was not this demand made before?" It has been made before.

The first Congressional report upon this claim of which I have any knowledge was away back in 1850, when it was reported favorably to the first session of the Thirty-first Congress. It was again reported on May 29 of the same year by the Senate Committee on Claims. January 6, 1852, it was again reported favorably in the House. That was in the Thirty-second Congress. On the 30th of January, 1852, it was reported to the first session of the Senate in the same Congress. In 1853 it was reported to the first session of the Thirty-third Congress; in 1884 it was reported to the Forty-eighth Congress, in 1886 to the Forty-ninth, and in 1887 it was reported in the Senate during the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress.

The claim also passed the Senate in the Forty-third Congress. In that body it had the support of such distinguished gentlemen as Senators Seward and Fish of New York, and Senator Wade of Ohio, and in the discussion of the bill Mr. Seward used this language:

Mr. President, the State of Virginia, beyond all doubt, contributed to the erection of this Capitol and of those public edifices which we now use for the Government of the United States the sum here specified. She either advanced that money as a loan to be repaid at some future time, or she gave it to the Government of the United States. If this money was advanced as a loan, the advance created a debt which it is now the duty of the Government to discharge. If, however, the money was contributed by way of gift or donation to the Government of the United States I do not see that it materially alters the case. In the one case there would be an obligation already existing, a debt already to be paid for money which has been borrowed. In the other case there is an advance which is the basis of a moral obligation which the Government may at any time recognize and assume, and that creates the debt. * * * This moral obligation strikes me as peculiarly appealing to the sense of honor of the Government of the United States. We are here occupying an edifice which was in part built for us by the State of Virginia; she is comparatively poor; we are only too rich. I think it does not comport with the pride and dignity of the United States that Congress and the Executive Departments should occupy halls for which they are indebted in whole or in part to the generosity of the States. * * * I am for discharging this obligation and securing to ourselves the right to feel that this Government owes nothing but gratitude to these States.

Mr. Fish, of New York, said:

Mr. President, I shall vote for the appropriation of this money with great pleasure. I do not care to consider the question whether this money was originally loaned or granted. It is enough for me that the States now claim it as a loan, and I am willing to vote to pay them. * * * I vote for this bill on the pure merits of the claim.

Mr. Wade, of Ohio, said:

The language connected with the original grant, it being sometimes called a gift, sometimes a donation, sometimes an advance, sometimes one thing and sometimes another, would seem to imply that perhaps it was not then expected the money would be repaid. All these considerations, however, did not satisfy me that we ought not to repay the money. I care but little what the expectation was at that time. If these States, actuated by magnanimity, and for the purpose of advancing the public good, gave us the money to erect the public buildings at that day, when our Treasury was comparatively empty, and when it was really an object to have such a donation, I would repay them. * * * The great stubborn fact still stands out that while the nation was poor we availed ourselves of the generosity of those States and took the money which they offered. Whether by way of gift or loan I care not. At all events, those who had the right to say on what conditions they granted the money, now say it was by way of advancement to be repaid at some convenient time in the future.

On this question I will not stand here to contend with a sovereign State. When she has made an advancement or loan, or even a donation, if you please to call it so, and we have availed ourselves of its benefits, I will not, when she asks to be repaid, and we have an overflowing Treasury, stand here to say that the money was a gift, and therefore ought not to be repaid. * * * I do not wish to have this Government indebted to any State in this Union or to anybody. I shall feel that it is under an obligation to the States of Maryland and Virginia until this money shall have been paid.

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITCH. May I ask why it is that interest is proposed to be allowed to the State of Maryland from 1843 and to Virginia from 1850?

Mr. SHAW. Interest is asked upon these advances only from the times when those States respectively first demanded repayment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland say, then, that it was not until 1843 that repayment was first demanded by Maryland?

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In other words, the matter had slept for almost half a century.

Mr. SHAW. In 1843 the Legislature of Maryland passed a resolution instructing her representatives in Congress to make a demand for her reimbursement——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The money having been advanced when?

Mr. SHAW. In 1790. In answer to the gentleman's remark about the long delay in demanding repayment, I will say that that delay was in accord with the spirit in which the advance was originally made, because for a long series of years in our early history the General Government was not in a condition to reimburse these States, probably not until 1812, and then the country became involved in war which resulted in the contraction of a debt, and while that debt existed and the national Treasury was comparatively empty, it would not have accorded with the spirit in which this money was originally advanced for these States to have demanded repayment.

And so it went along until 1836, when it may have been that the Government was in a condition to make repayment; but then came the panic of 1837, from which the country did not recover for six or seven years, and just at the expiration of that period, in 1842, Maryland came forward and made demand upon the Federal Government for repayment of the advance in question. I say, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this long delay was in accord with the spirit which prompted these States to do this generous act toward the Government of the United States.

Now, as to the intention of these respective States to make demand for repayment of this money, I will here remark that when the first resolution was pending before the Legislature of Virginia John Marshall, afterward Chief-Justice of the United States, was a member of that body——

Mr. KERR. I will ask the gentleman whether Virginia's interest in this measure has not been assigned already to a corporation which proposes to build a railroad from this city to Mount Vernon?

Mr. SHAW. In reply to the gentleman I will state that the provisions of this bill estop Virginia from making any assignment of her claim in this behalf. She is to be paid only whatever may be due her on the adjustment of accounts between the Government of the United States and the State; and as the State owes the Government more than the amount mentioned in this bill there will be nothing to assign.

Mr. KERR. But has not the assignment been already made?

Mr. SHAW. Not to my knowledge; at any rate it can not bind the United States.

Mr. WISE. If Virginia is entitled to this amount, has she not a right to make any assignment of it she may please?

Mr. KERR. But she has not a right to make an assignment and then ask the Government to pay the amount to her.

Mr. WISE. What has any assignment by Virginia to do with the question of the settlement of this account between that State and the United States?

Mr. BUCHANAN. But waiving that, has not Virginia in fact made such an assignment?

Mr. WISE. I do not know whether she has or not.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Was it not publicly stated in the Washington press a year or two ago that this had been done?

Mr. WISE. I do not know, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It was so stated repeatedly.

Mr. SHAW. I will ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN], even if Virginia had made such an assignment, would that bind the Government of the United States?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think not, in view of the fact that the Government is to-day the owner of a very large quantity of bonds of the State of Virginia on which no interest has been paid for years.

Mr. SHAW. And this bill provides for an adjustment of accounts between the Government and the States, for a set-off.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think the gentleman will find that in another bill of this series.

Mr. WISE. No, sir; it is in this bill.

Mr. SHAW. It is in this bill; and I will further state that the bill upon which the gentleman from New Jersey signed a minority report was not the bill reported favorably to this House. In the bill to which the gentleman's report referred, there was no provision for an adjustment of accounts between the States and the Government. The gentleman, unfortunately, got hold of the wrong bill; and whilst I indorse the views of the minority so far as they apply to that feature of the bill upon which the minority report was made, I am glad to inform the gentleman that they do not apply to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill, then, differs from the other in this respect only, that it provides for an adjustment of all accounts?

Mr. SHAW. For an adjustment of accounts between the States and the Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does it differ in any other respect?

Mr. SHAW. Not so far as I know.

Mr. FITCH. Has it not been the rule that the Government pays interest on advances only in cases where the individuals or corporations advancing the money have themselves paid interest or lost the interest?

Mr. SHAW. That, I believe, is the rule laid down by Attorney-General Wirt; but in this connection I will state there has never been a time, I believe, from the day that Virginia made this advance down to the present moment that she has not been in debt and paying interest. I am sure this has been the case with regard to Maryland. As the report recites, Maryland sold valuable lands in the vicinity of Cumberland which contained vast mineral wealth. She took that money and advanced it to the Government of the United States when she herself was in debt and paying interest; and she has been in debt from that time to the present moment.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman will allow me to state that the same thing is true in regard to Virginia.

Mr. SHAW. So that these circumstances, then, would bring this case within the decision of the Attorney-General. Here are two States that have paid interest and have lost interest from the time these advances were made, but in their generosity they demand interest upon their respective claims only from the time that they first demanded payment at the hands of the Federal Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the number of the bill under consideration is not House bill 1521.

Mr. SHAW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, that bill is identical in terms with the bill of the Forty-ninth Congress upon which my report was founded.

Mr. SHAW. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I have the two bills here, and have compared them.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to call his attention to a provision to be found at the foot of page 2?

Provided, however, That any sum of money due by the State of Virginia to the United States shall be deducted from the amount found due to the State of Virginia.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Precisely; I understand that, and that provision is found in House bill No. 1065 of the Forty-ninth Congress, and upon which I made my report.

Mr. WISE. But it covers your objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I understood there was something else in the present bill different from that bill.

Mr. SHAW. If the gentleman will refer to the views of the minority on this question in the Forty-ninth Congress he will find that they were based upon House bill No. 2504, and will also find that the favorable report was on House bill No. 1065. I hold that report in my hand and will show it to the gentleman if he desires to see it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will state to the gentleman that a number of these bills were introduced by several different members, all of them being identical in terms, and I suppose the discrepancy in numbers arose simply from the fact that one member got hold of one bill, and another a similar bill but of a different number.

Mr. SHAW. I again beg the gentleman's pardon; that was not the case. It is true that several bills were introduced. One was introduced by a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Cabell), and another by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON]. The bill favorably reported to the House was the bill introduced by Mr. COMPTON, and the gentleman who made the minority report got hold of the wrong bill, for the report shows that one of the objections urged against the bill was that it did not provide for an adjustment of accounts between the United States and these States. Therefore I am sure that the gentleman would not have urged this objection against a bill that contained that provision.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Upon that special point.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me a question?

Mr. SHAW. With pleasure.

Mr. ADAMS. This money was paid in 1790 and 1791. It must have been paid to some official of the United States. Is there an acknowledgment or receipt, by resolution of Congress or by any officer of the Government authorized to receive money, which tends to show that it was considered by the United States to be an advance of money on the part of these States, to be repaid by the General Government?

I will say to the gentleman that I am aware of that part of the report which refers to an extract from a letter of President Washington; but with the exception of that letter from President Washington to the commissioners is there any official evidence or any official information that the Congress of the United States regarded this as a loan of money to be refunded, rather than as a donation of money from the States?

Mr. SHAW. I was going to state when interrupted that John Marshall, afterwards Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, at that time a member of the Legislature of the State of Virginia—I mean at the time that the resolution proposing the advance was passed——

Mr. ADAMS. I understand the suggestion the gentleman is going to make; but I will call his attention to the fact that he represented the State which was advancing the money or donating it. Now I ask for the testimony of some one representing the other party, the United States.

Mr. SHAW. But the gentleman asked the question as to whether there was any record evidence of this money having been paid to the United States.

Mr. ADAMS. No, not exactly that; but whether that record evidence, which I suppose existed, does show whether the United States regarded it as a loan to be repaid, or as a donation.

Mr. SHAW. In the first place, I do not know whether it would be within the power of a recipient of a loan to decide as to the terms upon which he received it.

Mr. ADAMS. No.

Mr. SHAW. It seems to me that the party making the loan would also have something to say in regard to the conditions upon which it was made.

Mr. ADAMS. That is true, but not in this case. This has been held to be a grant. Now you say it is not a grant, but an advance, and I ask you to prove that. I ask for any admission or any testimony on the part of the recipient, that is, either the Congress of the United States or of any custodian or officer of the United States who had charge of the fund, which would tend to show, as a part of the res gestæ, to show that it was understood to be a loan and not a grant within the understanding that existed on the part of the recipient as well on the part of the donor.

Mr. SHAW. The word "grant" was used in the original resolution; but in the Legislature of the State of Virginia, Judge Marshall, on his motion, had the word "grant" stricken out and the word "advance" inserted. It is to be presumed, of course, that Judge Marshall knew the meaning of the terms that he used.

Mr. ADAMS. Undoubtedly. But that is an act on the part of the person who advances the money.

Mr. WISE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that this is not on a par with a person loaning money. It was an act on the part of the State.

Mr. ADAMS. Exactly, but the State was the party.

Mr. WISE. It was a public act, not a private one.

Mr. ADAMS. I am aware of that; but my question was whether it was understood on the part of the recipient to be a loan to be returned, or whether it was understood to be a donation.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to suggest an answer?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly. I want information upon the subject.

Mr. RAYNER. Suppose I say that I will loan you $10,000, and you, without saying a word, take it; is that a loan or a gift?

Mr. ADAMS. Ah, but that is not the case here. I have already said I will accept a grant, but not a loan.

Mr. RAYNER. Suppose there is nothing said. Suppose the States of Maryland and Virginia, both of them, say, "We will loan or advance to the United States this money," and the Government takes it under the conditions prescribed by the act authorizing the transfer of the money from the State treasury to the United States Treasury, as in this case; is that a loan or a gift?

Mr. ADAMS. Without any other condition?

Mr. RAYNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. But that is not the case here, for there was a statement on the part of the United States that it would accept a grant. That being the case, there is a presumption that nothing else was understood, and that the United States accepted this money as a grant. Now, I would admit that you might overcome that presumption; and I only ask you whether there is official evidence to overcome it.

Mr. RAYNER. The evidence that surrounds the advancement of the money, the acts of the Assembly of Maryland and of Virginia, and another act that was adopted by Virginia by which the capital was to be located at Williamsburgh, or making provision for the location of the capital, and the repeal of that act and the enactment of this new act, all go to show conclusively that this was an advancement of money and not a donation.

Mr. ADAMS. Not conclusively.

Mr. RAYNER. I say that I agree to the proposition that if this was a donation by Maryland and by Virginia they have not got the right to recover.

Mr. ADAMS. They have the right to ask for it.

Mr. RAYNER. They have the right to ask for it, but they have no right to collect or claim it. But looking at the acts of the Assembly, and looking at the circumstances surrounding the passing of these acts and at the fact that the title of the act was changed from the words "Virginia should present" to the words "Virginia should advance," or from the word "grant" to "advance," and remembering that the most eminent lawyer that we have ever had in this country prepared that act and changed the title of the act from making a donation to making an advancement, I say it is clear that it was not a gift.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour has expired. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1521) to provide for paying certain advances made to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was received by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 11139) to authorize the building of a bridge or bridges across the Mississippi River at La Crosse, Wis.;

An act (H. R. 11262) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Richmond, Nicholasville, Irvine and Beattyville Railroad;

An act (H. R. 11764) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives; and

An act (H. R. 1152) for the relief of the legal representatives of Eliza M. Ferris.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the river and harbor bill.

The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 13.

Mr. CHEADLE. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHEADLE] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 152, noes 11.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11765) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. KERR. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. DUNHAM (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors whether he intends to make a statement in regard to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] asked unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill for information should be dispensed with, but objection was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. DUNHAM. I understand that; but what I want to get at is——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not interrupt the reading of the bill unless the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] withdraws his demand for the reading.

Mr. DUNHAM. No; but my understanding is that if the chairman of the committee intends to make a statement with regard to the provisions of this bill, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] will probably not insist upon its being read in full at this time. Therefore I would ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to state what are his intentions in regard to that matter.

Mr. SOWDEN. Regular order.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SOWDEN and Mr. HIESTAND. I object.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, there is no disposition on the part of the committee to consume time in the general discussion of this bill, and unless some gentleman desires to speak upon the bill generally, I will now ask unanimous consent that it be read by paragraphs for amendments.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute which I propose to offer for the entire bill, and which I desire to discuss in connection with the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CRAIN. An hour, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KERR. I rise for the purpose of answering the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD]. The gentleman says that there is no disposition to discuss this bill unless some information about it is required by members. I find that the report of the committee contains very little information in regard to the matters contained in the bill, and I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee, if he knows, the reasons for appropriating the various items proposed to be appropriated in this bill. There are several hundred items provided for in the bill, appropriations for a large number of creeks and rivers the very names of which I have never heard before, and I would like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors what particular reasons there are appealing to the judgment of this House why these appropriations should be made, and unless he can give us that information we shall be voting in the dark.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The chairman of the committee was unfortunate enough not to hear distinctly the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KERR. I say that this bill contains several hundred items proposing appropriations for a large number of creeks, rivers, and harbors, the names of which I have never heard before.

Mr. SPINOLA. You could not pass the civil-service examination, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERR. Perhaps not, but I would like to know what special reasons exist for making these appropriations, and I think that information ought to be found in the report of the committee.

Mr. BLANCHARD. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa, I would state that it is perhaps unfortunate for the committee, as well as for the gentleman himself, that he does not happen to know even by name all of the rivers in the various States of the Union. There are perhaps one hundred and fifty items of appropriation in this bill, every one of which was in the bill of last session which passed this House by more than a two-thirds vote, and passed the Senate by a two-thirds vote. This bill appropriates in round numbers $11,900,000 in the aggregate. It is based upon the Engineer's reports, which are now before me and which are accessible to the gentleman from Iowa and to every other gentleman upon this floor. The appropriations in the bill are predicated upon the estimates of the Chief of Engineers, which aggregate $36,000,000 for the fiscal year 1890. This bill, therefore, appropriates a little less than 33⅓ per cent. of the amount which the Chief of Engineers says can be profitably expended during that fiscal year upon works of this character, and is but little more than one-half as large as the river and harbor bill passed at the last session of this Congress.

As for the reasons for inserting the particular items which go to make up the bill, I refer the gentleman to the Engineer's reports, which are contained in four volumes and are to be had in the document-room of the House.

I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], who desires to address the committee.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee has generously yielded me thirty minutes, with the understanding that he will give me more time if I require it.

The objection I have to this bill is that it does not appropriate enough money to carry on the various works of internal improvement now progressing under the conduct and management of the Engineer Corps of the Army. I would be pleased to have the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors tell us why it is that this session of Congress is to be asked to vote for an aggregate appropriation of a little more than $11,000,000, when the last session of this Congress, by a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives and by a very large majority in the Senate, appropriated nearly $23,000,000? Is there anything in the present local condition of the various works of internal improvement throughout the country which demands this reduction?

Is there anything in the condition of the funds in the Treasury of the United States which requires a more economical or an inadequate appropriation from this Congress? We are told by the Democrats, and the statement is acquiesced in partially by the Republicans, that there is a large surplus in the Treasury. The Democratic party in this House wrestled for seven long months with the problem, "How shall we reduce taxation in order to prevent a surplus accumulation in the Treasury of the United States?" and to-day the Republican majority in the United States Senate refuses to concur in our resolution to take a holiday recess because it is so anxious to pass a tariff-reform bill for the purpose of reducing revenue and thereby preventing the accumulation of a surplus. Certainly, then, the committee can not justify itself in bringing in a bill of this character upon the hypothesis that there is not sufficient money in the Treasury to-day or that there is not likely to be when the appropriation becomes available to meet appropriations adequate for the judicious continuance of the works already projected.

Is there anything, I ask the committee, in the local condition of the various works of public improvement which justifies this reduction of 50 per cent.? If there be nothing, then this committee stands without any basis to rest upon, unless it be of a quasi-political character or unless it be upon the apprehension that the Executive may veto a larger appropriation. And in this connection I call the attention of the House to this fact, that in making these appropriations the question should not be in the mind of any Representative whether the President will exercise his veto power or not. The question is not whether this is a short session and there may therefore be danger of not passing any bill; but the question is, are these improvements necessary on account of their national character and on account of their commercial importance?

I applied to the Chief of Engineers to ascertain whether there was anything in the local condition of these works which would justify the expenditure of a less sum than that which was appropriated in the first session of this Congress. I wrote him two letters, which I will read; and then I will read his replies:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly inform me whether there is anything in the status of the operations being conducted under your general direction for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country which would demand the expenditure of a less sum of money during the next fiscal year than the amount which has been available during the present fiscal year? Has not the appropriation for the present fiscal year been expended as rapidly as local conditions would authorize?

Your obedient servant,

W. H. CRAIN,
Member of Congress, Texas.

General CASEY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly furnish me answers to the following questions at your earliest convenience?

1. What is the estimated amount of money under the present scheme which it is contemplated will furnish 20 or 25 feet of water on Galveston Bar; and what amount is estimated for 30 feet?

2. What is the estimated amount for the carrying out of the scheme for the improvement of Aransas Pass, Texas?

I will state that both these points are in my district.

3. How much of the last appropriation for Galveston will be available on the 1st day of June, 1889?

4. What amount will be available on the 1st day of June, 1889, of the last appropriation for Aransas Pass?

5. What amount do you say can be profitably expended at Galveston during the next fiscal year?

6. What amount do you say can be profitably expended at Aransas Pass during the next fiscal year?

7. Is it not disadvantageous to river and harbor improvements to make limited appropriations instead of appropriations in accordance with your official estimates and recommendations? And if so, why?

8. Would there not in reality be a saving to the Government if annual appropriations for river and harbor improvements were made sufficiently large to enable the engineers in charge of the work to continue their operations without cessation? And is not a large amount of money annually wasted in repairing damages done during the interval between the date of the cessation of work occasioned by the exhaustion of one appropriation and the time when another becomes available? And does not the occasional failure of Congress to pass a river and harbor bill occasion the use of a large portion of the next appropriation in repairing works and the plant used in carrying them on?

9. Is not the failure of the Army engineers to accomplish contemplated improvement within a given time very largely attributable to the refusal or failure of Congress to furnish them with sufficient funds annually to carry on their work continuously?

10. Would not the improvement of our national harbors and rivers be very much facilitated and be made less expensive if Congress were to make an annual appropriation to be expended upon such improvements under the direction of the Secretary of War, and if the present driblet system of river and harbor appropriations were abandoned?

As I desire to use your replies within the next few days, I will be greatly obliged if you will furnish them at the earliest possible moment.

I have the honor to be, general, your obedient servant,

W. H. CRAIN,
Member of Congress, Texas.

General CASEY,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

I will now read the replies which I received from the Chief of Engineers to these pertinent questions:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17, 1888.

SIR: I beg leave to state, in reply to your letter of the 13th instant, received on the 15th, that in forming the estimates for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, the most economical administration of the works was, as far as possible, taken into consideration, as well as the average grants for each work during the past few years; but the appropriations in the last river and harbor act for the year were very considerably below these estimates.

The estimates submitted to the present session of Congress for the year ending June 30, 1890, were formed with the same end in view, and there is no reason known to demand their reduction.

The lateness at which the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1889, were made prevented any expenditure in the early part of the present fiscal year, but the appropriations are now being expended as rapidly as the season will admit consistent with the proper conduct of the works. It is probable that, with the exception of a few works, the greater part of the appropriations will be expended within a year.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. H. CRAIN,
United States House of Representatives.

When I asked a member of the River and Harbor Committee why it was that the committee had appropriated in this bill only 50 per cent. of the appropriations of last year, I was met by the statement that a large amount of money was still in the hands of engineers. Certainly that is the fact; but those engineers have made contracts, and the appropriations are subject to those contracts; seven months remain for the expenditure of the balances still in the Treasury subject to the drafts of the engineers in charge of the respective works of improvement; and the Chief of Engineers himself says that there is nothing in the status of these works which would justify a reduction below the estimates which he has made, and which, according to the statement of the chairman of the committee, have been reduced to about 33⅓ per cent.

In reply to the other letter the Chief of Engineers says:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17, 1888.

SIR: I beg leave to make the following replies to the interrogatories in your letter of the 13th instant:

To question 1. The Board of Engineers to which the subject of the improvement of the entrance to Galveston Harbor was referred, in a report dated January 21, 1886 (Annual Report Chief of Engineers for 1886, part 2, page 1297) estimated the cost of jetties completed to the 30-foot depth of water outside at $7,000,000, their aggregate length being 54,000 feet.

The estimated cost of jetties out to the crest of the bar, $3,000,000, and that this amount would probably give two-thirds of the depths that jetties carried out to the 30-foot curves would give. These estimates suppose that the money would be supplied as fast as needed.

But, in the opinion of the board, the depths which jetties will maintain can not be stated with precision. The case differs widely from that of the South Pass of the Mississippi, where the scouring current results from the outflow of a large river. At Galveston, before the water can flow out (to produce scour), the tidal basin must be filled from the sea and the area of the inflow is materially affected by the necessary contraction caused by the construction of the jetties. For this reason the problem is somewhat indeterminate, and it is impossible to foretell with exactness the depth which can be obtained with the works that are projected.

To question 2. The original estimate of the cost of the work at Aransas Pass is $2,052,543. The amount required for completion (in addition to the appropriation of August 11, 1888) is $1,471,000.

To question 3. The last appropriation (of August 11, 1888) for Galveston entrance will be entirely expended June 30, 1889.

To question 4. The probable amount that will be available July 1, 1889, for Aransas Pass is $30,000.

To question 5. The amount that can be profitably expended at Galveston during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, as stated in annual report of 1888, page 173, is $1,000,000.

To question 6. The least amount that can be profitably expended at Aransas Pass during the same period is $200,000 (annual report of 1888, page 176), but it would be far more beneficial to the work, both as regards the ultimate cost and early completion, if this amount was increased to $500,000.

That is the great trouble, Mr. Chairman, with all these river and harbor bills. The engineers make their estimates upon the supposition that Congress will make appropriations as rapidly as they become necessary. But what is the fact? Congress appropriates only from one-third to one-half of the amounts estimated by the Chief of Engineers. A large portion of that money is wasted in repairing damages to the works resulting from a failure of the appropriations necessary to enable the engineers in charge to carry them on to completion, and in repairing damages to plant, attributable to the same causes.

We have often heard it said that this Government should be administered upon business principles. I ask any gentleman on the floor this question: If he intended to make an improvement of any character, whether it was the construction of a fence or the erection of a building, would he begin in the latter case, for example, by digging the foundations, then letting the work lie for six or twelve or eighteen months, and at the end of that time use what means he might have accumulated in repairing the damage which had been done by this neglect? Would he then build one story, and let that story remain for six or twelve months or two years, until he had accumulated money to build a second story, a portion of which money would have to be expended in repairing the damage done to the work by the elements or other causes? Not at all. He would begin with the foundation and continue without cessation until the work was completed.

But the Government of the United States, in these river and harbor improvements, acts very differently. The order for the survey is made to determine whether the contemplated improvement is feasible or not, or whether the commercial importance of the locality tributary to the projected improvements justifies the expenditure of the public money. Then the House of Representatives formulates a bill in which $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000 are appropriated to carry on the work; and when the committee formulating the bill is called upon to give a reason why the entire amount recommended is not appropriated subject to local conditions, the answer is, "You can not pass such a bill through the House," or "Put it on in the Senate," or "The President will veto the bill."

To question 7 and the remaining questions. The effect in general of supplying insufficient amounts at uncertain periods for river and harbor improvements is undoubtedly to increase their cost, the amount of increase depending upon the nature of the work and the object to be obtained. These remarks are particularly applicable to works that are undertaken for the improvement of harbors upon sandy coasts, which are always of considerable magnitude. Because of the character of the work to be done and the natural deterioration consequent upon delay, together with the movement of the sands, which tend to neutralize partially constructed works or largely increase their cost of completion, this class of work, more than any other, requires to be prosecuted vigorously as well as continuously.

In this connection I inclose an extract from the last annual report of Maj. Thomas H. Handbury, Corps of Engineers, on the progress of the construction of the canal at the Cascades of the Columbia River, Oregon, which will illustrate the subject under consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. LINCOLN CASEY,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. H. CRAIN, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives.

The Chief of Engineers kindly sent me this report of Major Handbury, from which I will read the following extract. The engineer whom I am quoting is speaking with reference to the improvement of the Cascades of the Columbia River, Oregon, as suggested in the letter of the Chief of Engineers to which I have just referred, and he says:

From the general outline given of the condition of the work, it will be seen that a little more than one-third of the excavation required to complete the canal has been accomplished. It is doubtful if so large a proportion of the other necessary work is finished.

To bring the canal to its present state with the small appropriations that have from time to time fallen to its lot, it has taken a period of twelve years. At this rate it will require perhaps twenty-four years more before any benefit to commerce will result from this work or the country receive the least remuneration for the money expended. A generation will have been born and gone to its grave between the beginning and the ending of an enterprise which a healthy syndicate would have prosecuted to completion within six years at furthest after commencement and been in the enjoyment the balance of the time of a liberal income from the money invested.

So it is with the two ports I represent and which are appropriated for in this bill, one in the sum of $300,000 and the other in the sum of $65,000. It is estimated by the engineers that it will take $6,200,000 to complete the work at Galveston Harbor, and about $1,400,000 at Aransas Pass. Giving $300,000 a year for the port of Galveston how long will it take to complete the work if it be conceded that every session of Congress will witness the passage of a river and harbor bill making an equal appropriation, and that the President's veto will never be interposed? Mr. Chairman, it will take thirty years at least to complete the work contemplated, because of the fact that a large amount annually, as I have already stated, and as has been stated and explained by the Chief of Engineers in his letter, will necessarily have to be expended in repairing damage done by the elements, by marine insects, and to the plant used in carrying on the work.

How long with the same conditions existing will it require to complete the work at Aransas Pass? Twenty years at least. And shall the twenty States and Territories west of the Mississippi, covering more than two-thirds of the territorial area of the country, excluding Alaska from the computation, having one-fourth of the population of the country, furnishing more than 75 per cent. of the grain and beef exported to European markets—shall all that territorial area, with its millions of people—and remember that four Territories out of this area will be admitted as States if the action of the Democratic caucus is to be taken as an indication of the action of the House and the Senate—be compelled to wait?

Must that territory and those people wait from twenty to forty years before they will have an opportunity to ship their surplus products to Europe from a port on the coast of Texas? San Francisco is very nearly 1,000 miles nearer to the Texas coast than it is to New York. Denver is 730 miles nearer to the coast of Texas than it is to New York; and when we take into consideration that everything that is shipped from Denver, for instance, or points similarly situated, has to pass through St. Louis, which is about equidistant from Galveston and Denver, and that there is an additional cost of transportation from St. Louis to New York, while at the same time the transportation across the ocean from Galveston or Aransas Pass to Liverpool will be but a fraction more than from New York to Liverpool, it is easily seen how much benefit will be conferred upon the people in the vast area west of the Mississippi, as well as upon the people of the entire country, by these improvements.

But, Mr. Chairman, will these improvements or either of them be obtained by these driblet appropriations? I complained somewhat at the last river and harbor bill because it did not give to Aransas Pass or Galveston the amount that I thought they should receive even in an annual bill; but at the same time I told my people, in written communications upon this subject, that when it became evident to the Congress of the United States that the work being carried on by the engineers would be successful, and that the tentative efforts of the local engineers in charge would demonstrate the feasibility of the schemes, I had no doubt Congress would recognize the national importance of the work and increase the annual appropriations.

But what do I find? When I read the bill, which evidently, with all due respect to the committee, was not studied, because it was impossible in the very nature of things after this House had organized on the 3d of December, for that committee to bring in a bill on the 12th of December to which they had given their best efforts—it must be conceded that they took the bill of last year and scaled it down 50 per cent. as a rule, with certain exceptions. They gave to Galveston $50,000 more than the one-half to which it would have been entitled on that basis, and to Aransas Pass a sum $15,000 more than the $50,000 to which it would have been entitled under that proportion. But what do these sums amount to, practically considered? What are $65,000 to complete a scheme requiring a million and a half dollars? What are $300,000 when contrasted with the great amount required for Galveston? They are mere drops in the bucket. It is absolutely money wasted to make these driblet appropriations.

I believe that the proper system for making such internal improvements would be to have a board of engineers to determine upon certain places upon which all the money appropriated shall be expended until the work had been accomplished, and then take up new points.

But this system has been entered upon by this Government as a part of its policy, and as this system will never go down until it is buried beneath the eternal covering of public indignation, I, representing these two ports, accept the situation; but I ask at the hands of this committee and at the hands of this House an appropriation consistent with the national importance of these respective works, and consistent, in part at least, with the recommendation of the Chief Engineer. The Chief Engineer in his letter to me says that $200,000 is the least amount that can be profitably expended at Aransas Pass, and that $500,000 should be expended, and he recommends an appropriation of $1,000,000 for Galveston.

And in considering this question, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I call your attention to a remark made by the Father of the House in 1884, when the Eads bill was before this House for consideration. He said:

I am in favor of appropriating for Galveston not because it belongs to the State of Texas, for it does not; but because it belongs to the entire country.

Major Handbury continues:

From 1876, the date of the first appropriation for this work, up to the present time but $1,142,500 have been made available for its prosecution, which is an average of about $95,000 per year. Various appropriations have been made during this time, the total of which, as given above, if invested by an enterprising company at 4 per cent., the yearly interest on the investment and the sum would amount to $1,490,000, an excess over the amount appropriated of nearly $348,000, for which there is nothing to show, because the yearly interest, $79,600, is almost as much as the usual yearly appropriation made.

To illustrate simply the effect which the policy of small appropriations for the work thus made will have upon its ultimate cost to the people, let us suppose that the work is estimated to cost $3,000,000, and that an annual appropriation of $100,000 is made for carrying it out, the time to be consumed in carrying out the project will be thirty years. The yearly appropriations, with their accumulated interest at 4 per cent., will, added, amount to $5,832,800, nearly twice as much as the estimated cost of the work.

This demonstrates most clearly that the driblet system of appropriations, if carried on, will make every work of great magnitude cost nearly twice as much as the original estimates of the engineers having the matter in charge.

Continuing, he says:

If, instead of this, suppose that the annual appropriations had been made in amounts as large as could be prudentially expended—say $500,000; under this mode the cost would be $3,449,000, a saving of $2,383,800, the work will be completed in six years instead of thirty, and the people at once begin to reap the benefit of the money of the Government.

That does not include the amount resulting from the destruction and the renewal of plant and appliances and other costs that must necessarily pertain to a long term of years and small appropriations. Nor does it include the large amounts that result from the difference in freight rates on the commerce that would take this new route were the improvements finished, but which now goes by some other to market. If all works of this character were made before any advantage can accrue to commerce, it does seem that the policy of small appropriations running through a long term of years increases enormously their ultimate cost.

Acting upon this idea, I propose, Mr. Chairman, to offer at the proper time for the consideration of this committee a substitute which is in effect and substance the act passed at the last session of this Congress with such alterations and modifications as the changed conditions make necessary, striking out all propositions for surveys. The amount of this bill would be a million or thereabout less than the amount of the appropriation at the last session.

Now, I repeat my question to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. What is the reason that your committee appropriates only one-half of what it appropriated last year? What reasons are there for eliminating $11,000,000 from this appropriation for the continuation of these works, if they are to be completed? I understand there are no reasons given. The Chief of Engineers says there is no reason. Can it be because the river and harbor bill is unpopular?

In answer to that I will read from the report of the chairman of the committee made during the last session. Here is his language:

The largest river and harbor bill prior to this one was that of 1882, which carried an appropriation of $18,738,875, upon estimates by the Chief of Engineers that $33,224,300 could be profitably expended in the fiscal year. That bill appropriated 56½ per cent. of the estimates. The President, exercising his constitutional prerogative, returned the bill of 1882 to the House without his approval, and the Congress, exercising its constitutional right, by a two-thirds majority in each House, passed the bill, the executive veto to the contrary notwithstanding, and it became a law.

Thereupon many of the newspapers at the great railroad centers raised a hue and cry against the act and against those by whose votes it had been passed, making use in the attack of the grossest misrepresentation and personal abuse in the endeavor to blind the people to their own interests. But the great masses of the people in all sections sustained the act, and the popularity of the river and harbor bill has grown apace.

As it has grown apace the appropriations suggested by the committee have decreased apace.

It has come to be seen that it is of prime importance for the protection of the public from the undue exactions of railroad companies that the great natural highways of commerce, the water ways of the country, should be placed in the best condition to compete with them.

And how did you and your committee come to the conclusion to reduce it to 50 per cent. of what it was last year?

You say:

Your committee believe that at no time in the history of our Government have the people, with as great unanimity as now, demanded of Congress liberal appropriations for rivers and harbors.

That is what the gentleman said twelve months ago; and what does he say now? Of course when I am speaking of him I am speaking of him in his capacity as chairman of the committee.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I ask if in your proposed substitute you seek to appropriate the amount recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. CRAIN. No, sir. I propose as a substitute to introduce the bill which was passed by the last session of Congress, and which is in accordance with the recommendation of your committee, with such amendments as the Senate chose to put upon it. If I had my way, I would propose a bill carrying the exact estimates in every instance of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. Why do you not in your substitute propose to appropriate the amount recommended by the Secretary of War, and thereby follow your argument to its legitimate conclusion?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I extend half an hour of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN]. The other half of my time I propose to reserve. I trust the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed.

Mr. CRAIN. I will answer my colleague by stating that I fear very much that, under the influence of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, which is potential in this House, as we all know, even this substitute will not pass, although it is really the act of the committee at the last session, with such amendments as were put in by the Senate. Why, then, should I suggest another substitute which would be twice as large as the aggregate amount appropriated in this bill? That is the answer to the gentleman's question. The committee in their report on last year's bill say:

Your committee believe that at no time in the history of our Government have the people, with as great unanimity as now, demanded of Congress liberal appropriations for rivers and harbors.

If the people demanded these liberal appropriations with such unanimity twelve months ago, is there any information in possession of this committee which they are able to give to the House that will show that the same unanimity does not now exist?

Again, the chairman of the committee says very eloquently:

No country on the globe has been blessed equal to ours with water ways, and if we fail adequately to improve them we will be neglecting the opportunities afforded us by a bountiful Providence.

What change has come over the spirit of the dreams of the committee that, after giving their sanction to such eloquent language twelve months ago, they should come in here to-day with a bill proposing to appropriate only one-half as much, in the same country with the same water ways and blessed by the same all-bountiful Providence?

Again:

Other nationalities, with rivers and harbors in no wise comparable to ours, have appropriated millions for their improvement where we appropriate thousands.

I use this argument in support of my substitute, because it is much more strongly put than I can present it. The language is better than I can employ. It conveys my ideas accurately, and it is fortified by the wisdom of the fifteen gentlemen composing the Rivers and Harbors Committee in this House.

Again the chairman says:

While the present bill is a little larger than that of 1882, it must be remembered that our commercial and navigable interests have greatly increased since then; the volume of our commerce has largely augmented.

If that was the condition of this country twelve months ago, wherein has it changed since then? If the volume of our commerce had largely augmented then, it has still more largely augmented since then. If our trade had improved then, it has still more largely improved now. If $22,000,000 were necessary then because of the reasons assigned in this report, why is it that only $11,000,000 are necessary to-day after we have grown in population, increased in trade, and augmented in commerce during the past year?

The report says:

The number of items, or separate appropriations, in this bill is much larger than in the bill of 1882. More rivers and more harbors are appropriated for.

The same thing can be said of the bill before the House to-day. In fact, there is less in this bill than there was in the act of last session, because there is no proposition for surveys, or for new improvements, but the appropriations are for "continuing improvements," for the continuation of projects or schemes already being carried on under the supervision of the Government engineers.

Again, says the report:

The bill deals liberally with such works as will largely and generally facilitate the commerce of the country by opening up the larger water ways to free and easy navigation. While pursuing this general policy as to the larger water ways, the committee have not neglected the smaller ones, though it is confidently asserted that no single appropriation is embodied in the bill which is not defensible by the engineers' reports and by the amount and value of commerce to be benefited by it. Your committee assert as their deliberate judgment, formed after a thorough study of these matters, that the aggregate of benefit effected by the smaller appropriations is, in proportion to the money expended, fully as great, if not greater, than that resulting from the larger appropriations. Oftentimes a river, navigable from 40 to 70 miles, penetrates a section of country where there are no railroads, and where their water way affords to the people of such section the only means of access to and from the markets of the country, save the ordinary country roads.

Upon this point I have nothing to say. I have no fault to find with the committee for selecting any place throughout the country which, in its judgment, or in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers, demands an appropriation for its improvement. It may be, as has been suggested, that every little rill, every little rivulet, which courses through any portion of the country lends its aid to swell the volume of the streams that bear their waters to the rivers and thence to the oceans upon whose bosom floats the commerce of the world; and consequently I have no criticism to make of the committee in this respect; but I do complain that in making their appropriations they make them so small in certain cases that they are actually valueless or approximately valueless; for, to my knowledge, the engineers in some instances retain the appropriation and refuse to expend it simply because it is too small to be of any advantage. In other cases the man who has had the contract one year monopolizes it for the next year simply for the reason that the new appropriation is not large enough to enable any person to compete with the contractor who is already furnished with the plant necessary to carry on the work.

Again say the committee:

Your committee assert as their deliberate judgment, formed after a thorough study of these matters, that the aggregate of benefit expected by the smaller appropriations is, in proportion to the money expended, fully as great, if not greater, than that resulting from the larger appropriations.

What do the committee say upon the bill now before the House?

The purpose for which appropriations of this character are made is an entirely proper and legitimate one, and considering the number and extent of our water ways and the enormous value of the commerce created by and dependent upon them, an annual allotment of even twenty millions a year would be a comparatively moderate sum for a country of the continental dimensions and limitless resources of the United States to expend upon their improvement and maintenance.

Here is a confession of judgment on the part of the committee. They say that they propose to expend only $12,000,000 in round figures, yet in the report recommending this expenditure to the House they assert that an expenditure of $20,000,000 would be proper to be made in a country of so large resources as the United States. Why, then, gentlemen of the committee, did you not recommend such an expenditure? Give this House some valid reason—some sound, substantial, intelligent reason—why you should not do what you say in your report ought to be done.

As I have already said—and I can not repeat it too often—the Chief of Engineers says there is nothing in the status of these works that justifies the reduced expenditure. He says that it will cost twice as much to carry them on to completion under the present system as if the appropriations were judiciously made; that, if the engineers were given enough money to carry on these works, they could accomplish them, but by the system of appropriations adopted there is a large waste of the annual appropriation for river and harbor improvements.

But the committee go on to say:

The objection to river and harbor bills urged by a portion of the public press of the country your committee conceive to be based largely upon editorial provincialism—that is, carelessness and want of knowledge of the needs and conditions of other localities than their own. So far as the people themselves are concerned, your committee is satisfied that there is no bill before Congress that embodies more popular interest and urgency and gives more general satisfaction than the bill for the care and improvement of our harbors and water ways.

If this is so, gentlemen of the committee, why do you not respond to the public demand? Admitting your statement to be true—and I believe it to be true—why is it that when popular clamor asks for improvements all over this country you do not respond to that clamor? If, as you say, there is no bill before this Congress which is so popular, which is so much liked by the people, which is so valued by all sections of the country, why is it that you do not conform your action to this suggestion and make your bill what it was last year?

The committee continue:

The able and experienced engineer who at present fills the position of Chief of Engineers has stated that after a most thorough and painstaking study and investigation of the river and harbor bill of the late session of Congress—a bill which carried over $22,000,000—his conclusion was that not more than one-fifth of 1 per cent. of the same could properly be placed under the head of "objectionable items" which should have been omitted from the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the House to this suggestion. Here is the River and Harbor Committee supporting its bill by a suggestion that in the last act not more than one-fifth of 1 per cent. of the items appropriated for might be classed as objectionable items. If that is so, why not put them in this bill? If they were not objectionable in the act of the last session, why are they objectionable in the present bill?

Your committee make bold to say that no better showing, if as good, can be made for any one of the general appropriation bills passed during this or former Congresses.

As a matter of fact the value of a given improvement has no direct relation to its magnitude or cost. The opening of a comparatively small stream or channel entrance may be of as great importance to the community interested in and to be affected by it as a vastly greater one to some other.

With the opening of water navigation freights are reduced and the railroads are forced to be reasonable in their charges.

Why do you not, then, appropriate money to open water navigation? When the canals freeze up I am told the railroads in the North and East raise their freight charges; and when spring comes, when the ice thaws and the canals can be used, then freights come down. You recognize this principle; you appeal to this House to pass this bill because of the assertion of this principle. Why do you not carry it out by making the necessary appropriations so that the people of the United States can within a reasonable time enjoy the benefits that are to flow from competition against the railroads affected by water ways? But no; you pinch, you squeeze, you cut down, you pare, you economize until your appropriations amount to a mere waste, except in certain cases where appropriations in the new bill are made about the same as in the last preceding bill. The committee goes on to say:

With the opening of water navigation freights are reduced and the railroads are forced to be reasonable in their charges; trade improves, production increases, and the community thrives—all because a few thousand dollars were expended in dredging away the bar at the mouth of the stream or removing the obstructions which rendered its navigation dangerous or costly.

It may be urged that I object to this bill because the ports in my district have not been adequately provided for. I might refer to other places in the country which are in the same condition. I might call attention, for instance, to the improvement near Augusta, in Georgia. I might allude to the fact that the small amount of money appropriated there for the improvement of the river is grossly inadequate; that $100,000 expended there would enable Augusta to have the same commerce which it had before the channel of the river had filled up by the sediment carried down by the spring floods. There are other cases of a similar character, but I will not detain this committee by referring to them in detail.

The committee continues:

The people of such neighborhood can never be convinced that the money was unwisely or unrighteously appropriated, nor will they object to similar expenditures elsewhere.

Why do you not appropriate it, then, if they can not be convinced that the money was unwisely or unrighteously appropriated? If that be the case, why do you not appropriate a sufficient sum in each case? You give a good reason for doing that which you do not do.

The committee further says:

So also of the cases where the stream furnishes the sole means of transportation to a region otherwise inaccessible.

Right here I may say, parenthetically, that the producers and consumers of the country would be more largely benefited by a judicious and liberal expenditure of the money for the improvement of the water ways in order that they might compete with the railroads than by the passage of interstate-commerce acts or by any other similar legislation.

But the committee further says:

It is not contended that these small appropriations should be unduly multiplied, but it is insisted that they are legitimate when the facts are such as to warrant them.

The United States Supreme Court has passed upon this question and established the legal limitation upon the improvement of navigation at the cost of the Federal Treasury, namely: That if the water way be one that forms or may form part of a commercial highway, either interstate or foreign, it may be appropriated for by Congress as a national highway. Nor is it needful that in a given case the commerce to be benefited should be actually existent. It suffices that it should be clearly potential; in other words, that its development can be reasonably anticipated from the known and recorded facts. Otherwise some of the most valuable water ways would wait development forever. Glasgow would be a fishing village still, had not the Clyde been dredged.

People who are children to-day in Galveston and Aransas Pass will reach men's estate before the schemes contemplated by the Engineer department for the improvement of those ports will be completed under such a system as this, particularly when we take into consideration the fact that Congress may fail to pass a river and harbor bill or that the Presidential veto may be interposed.

The committee says:

The foreign commerce of the Mississippi Valley depends upon opening the mouth of the river and keeping it open. Nor does the custom-house rating establish the character of an improvement. Domestic commerce outweighs many times the foreign trade and does not need to pay customs dues to prove its value or national character.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already stated, this substitute is in substance the act passed at the last session of Congress with such changes as I have been able to make from the hasty review to which I have been forced because of the unexpected report of the committee of the bill now under consideration. I had no idea, knowing the personnel of that committee, the pains and labor they have bestowed on the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, that within nine days after the opening of Congress they would have been able to precipitate upon this House a measure carrying about eleven or twelve millions of dollars. Changes have been made in my substitute, which carries twenty or twenty-one millions of dollars, and I say in its support if it were right to pass it at the last session it is right to pass it now.

I defy any gentleman of the committee to point out any logical reason why the Congress of the United States should not pass a bill at this session similar to the one passed at the last session. No different conditions exist, except in isolated cases, and the appropriations are to be expended after the 30th of June next. As there is plenty of money in the Treasury, with no present expectation of the passage of a tariff bill, the Senate having shown that it will not support the Mills bill, passed by a Democratic House, and having every reason to believe the majority of the House will repudiate the Senate substitute—with a plethoric Treasury, with the people anxious to pass such a bill, as stated in the report of the committee from which I have just read, I ask, what good reason can be given why it should not pass? I appeal to the committee to give any reason why my substitute or a kindred measure should not pass.

I ask the committee, or any member of it, to give any reason why, if it was proper to appropriate $22,000,000 at the last session, it is not equally proper to appropriate enough money to enable the engineers of the Army to do enough work next year to justify the expectations of the people in the completion of these needed works of improvement. If we hold the engineers responsible, let us give them enough money to carry out their plans.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CRAIN. I will reserve that.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors whether the general debate is to go on the rest of the afternoon, or whether we are to go into the bill for the purpose of amendment?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say to the gentleman I am apprised that several gentlemen desire to speak, and I take it that the remainder of the afternoon will be expended in general debate upon the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas occupies an unique position with regard to this bill—the position of being the only member of Congress, certainly within the time that I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, who ever opposed a river and harbor bill on the ground that the aggregate amount appropriated is not large enough. Heretofore every gentleman who has had occasion to oppose river and harbor bills has done so because in his judgment the amount appropriated had been too large. I sympathize with the position of the gentleman from Texas, for I myself would like to see a larger amount appropriated each year for river and harbor improvement than we have found practicable in the past to appropriate.

The theory advanced by the gentleman from Texas is beautiful; but, Mr. Chairman, it is not practical. There is nothing in the world so practical as legislation and the methods of legislation, and by methods I mean the mode of procuring the passage of bills through a legislative body. It will be borne in mind by the Committee of the Whole that the largest river and harbor bill ever passed by the House was the one passed at the first session of this Congress, carrying in the aggregate something over $22,000,000, and we were enabled to pass a bill of that magnitude because of the fact that there had been no appropriation at all the preceding year, namely, at the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress. The large bill of last session was justified by the friends and tolerated by the enemies of river and harbor improvement in this House upon the ground of the failure of the appropriation for the preceding year.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, by those gentlemen in this House who have served here since the Forty-seventh Congress that there has been a failure of a river and harbor bill at the second session of every Congress from and inclusive of the Forty-seventh Congress down to this time. The gentleman from Texas, too, well knows that at the short session of past Congresses we have been unable to pass even a small river and harbor bill; and yet he presumes to lecture the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, because, forsooth, learning a lesson from the experience of the past, we have not brought in a bill of $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 and asked its passage at the hands of this Congress at its second session. The committee have not brought in a larger bill for the good reason that it is not considered possible to enact into law a larger bill than the one we have presented.

We have brought in a bill which we thought could pass. We have sought the practical road to legislation. We have indulged in no theories and no speculations. Along with reflections on what ought to be done, we have carefully considered what could be done. Our bill is based on both, and where the two have conflicted we have yielded to the practical.

Had we brought in a bill of $22,000,000, succeeding the large bill of the last session, there are not five men on this floor, I am satisfied, who will agree with the gentleman from Texas that it would be a practical measure in the sense that it ought to be enacted into a law. This, I take it, is a complete answer to the theoretical argument advanced by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I would like to ask what the committee were guided by, the importance of the work and the necessity of completing it, or the amount of the annual appropriation that you can probably get through Congress?

Mr. BLANCHARD. We were guided in the formation of the bill by the recommendations of the engineers and by the necessities of each project of improvement, but we were also practical enough to take into consideration the size of the bill as affecting favorably or unfavorably its passage through the two Houses.

Mr. CRAIN. Then you size up the bill by the probability of its passage?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me further. I did not interrupt him.

Mr. CRAIN. Pardon me. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes of my time if he will answer me.

Mr. BLANCHARD. No further answer is called for than the one already given. If the gentleman from Texas had his way he would bring in a bill of $25,000,000, and the result would be that Congress would not pass it, and Aransas Pass and Galveston, in which he is so much interested, would not receive one dollar for improvement.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, unable to give improvements of that character all that gentlemen who are interested in them may desire, have always endeavored to give such sums commensurate with the importance of the work as we think can be passed through both Houses of Congress and receive the Executive approval.

Mr. Chairman, it is within the time since the gentleman from Texas first became a member of Congress that a proposition was brought here from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors appropriating in a lump some six or seven millions of dollars to give to the harbor of Galveston 30 feet depth of water. The gentleman from Texas well knows that it was found utterly impossible to pass such a proposition through the then Congress and it had to be abandoned. And yet in the face of that experience in a recent Congress, the gentleman from Texas has criticised the committee in a manner somewhat harsh because we have not brought in at this time, at the short session of this Congress, a bill of $25,000,000, which would give Galveston the $1,000,000 which the Chief of Engineers says can be profitably expended there the coming fiscal year. Had we adopted the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers altogether, we would have brought in a bill aggregating $36,000,000; and will any gentleman tell me here, looking at the matter from a practical standpoint, that we could pass any such bill through the House? There is not a man on the floor other than the gentleman from Texas who believes that any such thing can be done. We have sought to appropriate in the bill now under discussion an amount that would enable the work already in progress upon many projects of river and harbor improvements throughout the United States to be continued throughout the fiscal year 1890; not all that was needed, perhaps, but enough to continue the work.

It is a fact that of the $22,000,000 appropriated by the bill of last session by far the greater part of it is still on hand. It will be expended by the end of the present fiscal year, which will be the 30th of June of the coming year. With what the present bill carries there need be no cessation of work the coming fiscal year upon projects of river and harbor improvement already begun.

With these remarks I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be recognized in his own time, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt but that this House has been more than surprised at what has occurred this afternoon. In the first place, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors present a bill appropriating $11,906,850 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country. In the second place, we have the spectacle presented to us by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], who complains and opposes the bill on the ground that the amount it appropriates is not high enough. He would have it increased to some twenty-odd million dollars. If he had his own way he would increase it to $36,012,250, the entire amount of the estimates submitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors by the engineers in charge of these improvements. His position is inconsistent and entirely irreconcilable. If he were consistent and logical he would advocate the adoption of a bill covering and appropriating the whole amount of the estimates submitted by the engineers, as already stated, rather than his substitute, which is a rescript of the bill passed at the first session of this Congress.

It is to be regretted that the proposition for these large expenditures of the public moneys should emanate from this side of the House when it stands pledged to the most economic management of our governmental affairs. If this bill should pass it would be the largest appropriation ever made for the improvement of rivers and harbors in any single Congress; that is, taking into consideration the amount already appropriated last session. In the language of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], we appropriated more in the bill passed last session than was ever appropriated for a similar purpose by any one given Congress. We appropriated nearly $23,000,000, and the reason given by the committee in justification of that extraordinary measure is found in the report accompanying the presentation of their bill to the House, from which I will cite the following extract:

> The failure to secure this or any amount for such purpose excited great complaint, and when this committee commenced their work at the beginning of the present session they were confronted with numerous demands for immediate appropriations. The committee did not think it proper to yield to these demands, but they embrace in the present bill the total amount to be expended for the next fiscal year. The failure of the last House to make any appropriation has thrown on your committee the duty of combining two river and harbor bills in one.

Two river and harbor bills in one!

The bill passed and went to the President on the 31st of last July; became a law without his approval, it not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which it originated within the time prescribed by the Constitution.

By this act, therefore, there was appropriated and in the hands of the Secretary of War $23,000,000 for the purpose of these improvements—or nearly $23,000,000. How much of this vast sum of money has been expended to date? Is it likely, or can it be possible, that this sum can be prudently expended upon these contemplated improvements within the next twelve months?

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SOWDEN. I regret that I must decline to be interrupted. I repeat, can it be possible that this large sum of money can be economically and advantageously expended upon these improvements during the coming year? We have the same items of appropriations in the bill now before this committee that are contained in the bill that became a law less than five months ago. In the bill now under consideration is contained an appropriation of $20,000 for the improvement of the harbor of Rockland, Me., while in the bill which became a law in August last was contained an appropriation of $30,000 for the improvement of the same harbor. How much of this $30,000 remains unexpended? Why appropriate the additional sum of $20,000 before exhausting the $30,000 heretofore appropriated? So we might analyze every item contained in this bill, and by comparison show that there is no necessity for the passage of this legislation. I will refer to but one more item on this subject. On page 7 of the present bill I find the following:

Improving the harbor of Philadelphia: For removal of Smith's Island and Windmill Island, in the State of Pennsylvania, and Petty's Island, in the State of New Jersey, or such parts of them and the shoals adjacent thereto as may be required, and for the improvement of the harbor between the cities of Philadelphia, Pa., and Camden, N. J., $200,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended until the title to the lands forming said islands shall be acquired and vested in the United States without charge to the latter.

In the bill which passed the first session of this Congress was contained a similar provision appropriating $500,000 for this purpose upon condition that no part of said money should be expended until the title to the lands forming said islands should be acquired and vested in the United States as therein provided.

Has this property become vested in the United States in accordance with these provisions so that the Government may proceed to make these improvements? Why appropriate $200,000 in addition to the $500,000 already appropriated for these improvements before the Government has acquired the title to the islands in question?

Mr. DUNHAM. That was not to be done until the Government was given title.

Mr. SOWDEN. Why make any further appropriation for this purpose until the Government has acquired title and possession of these islands? Why not first obtain the title to them and expend the $500,000 already appropriated for their removal before asking this additional appropriation of $200,000? Is this wise, is this prudent legislation?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague permit a question?

Mr. SOWDEN. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Because the chairman of the committee did not explain this I will explain it more satisfactorily.

Does my colleague understand that the appropriations in this bill do not take effect until after the 30th of June next, that they are the appropriations that are to continue from the 30th of June, 1889, until the 30th of June, 1890, and that there is not a dollar of this money that can be expended until the title is acquired by the United States? None of the money can be expended until that is done, but it is very likely that this title will be acquired within the next three or four months, and will be in the United States, because proceedings to that end are now going on.

Mr. SOWDEN. I understand this, but I did not yield to give my colleague an opportunity to make a speech, but only for a question.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I do not want to make a speech, but only to set the gentleman right as to what this bill means.

Mr. SOWDEN. The gentleman has stated, in the form of an inquiry addressed to me, that it will likely require some four months before the Government can acquire title to these islands. If it is a mere supposition that the Government may acquire title to these islands in four months, then there would be $500,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War, after the acquisition of title, to be applied towards their removal. I take it for granted, therefore, that it will be very doubtful whether the Government will obtain title to these islands before the meeting of the next Congress, and if it should, there will be $500,000 on hand, in charge of the Secretary of War unexpended, ready to be used in the removal of these obstructions, which could scarcely be expended in this direction before the next Congress would pass a similar act. Why not, then, allow our friends on the other side to assume control of these matters and cast upon them the responsibility of making the necessary appropriations to complete the removal of these islands?

I am opposed to the appropriation of $11,906,850 at this time for the improvement of rivers and harbors, when there is on hand nearly $23,000,000 for this purpose still unexpended. I think the time for making the appropriations is when the needs of these improvements demand them; and as long as the amount of money I have stated is on hand unexpended, why ask for an additional appropriation of nearly $12,000,000? Twelve millions of dollars plus twenty-three millions makes $35,000,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Twenty-two millions, not twenty-three.

Mr. SOWDEN. It is nearer twenty-three millions than twenty-two millions.

Mr. BLANCHARD. No; you are mistaken.

Mr. SOWDEN. Well, twenty-two millions plus $11,906,850 is nearly, if not quite, $34,000,000——

Mr. BLANCHARD. Thirty-three millions.

Mr. SOWDEN. I am satisfied that it is almost thirty-five millions. [Laughter.] I know the last bill carried nearly $23,000,000. Thirty-five millions to be appropriated for this purpose by a Congress that came into power upon the distinct pledge that it favored a business-like management of governmental affairs upon the most economical basis!

We appropriated nearly $23,000,000 only five months ago, the largest amount ever provided by any Congress for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country; yet it would seem that the committee having this bill in charge is still unsatisfied, and we are now asked for nearly twelve millions more! Why should this Democratic House appropriate the enormously large sum of nearly $35,000,000 for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country? These appropriations are unprecedented.

No single Congress ever appropriated so large a sum for this purpose as proposed by this Congress. Nor should we pass the bill now before the committee, particularly since we have just been informed by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], who has this bill in charge, that no former Congress ever passed a bill of this character at its second session. Why disregard this precedent and make this new departure? Why this undue haste? Why this unnecessary appropriation of the public moneys when the needs of these proposed improvements do not imperatively demand it, and especially when admittedly there remains an unexpended balance of nearly $23,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War appropriated for these purposes by the present Congress less than six months ago? I should be pleased to hear from the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] on this subject.

Mr. WEBER. Does the gentleman ascribe the defeat of the Democratic party to the last river and harbor bill or to other causes?

Mr. SOWDEN. There were several causes. That was one of them. I reserve the balance of my time.

A MEMBER. The Allentown public building bill was another. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS addressed the Chair.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have said to some gentlemen here that at about a quarter to 5 o'clock I would move that the committee rise. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he expects to speak beyond that time.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not. Mr. Chairman, one feature of this debate is remarkable, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] has said. The chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has risen here and advocated this bill on the ground of the small amount appropriated by it. Then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], also an intelligent and able member of this House, has risen and complained of the bill for the very reason that the amount appropriated is so small. I believe that both of these gentlemen are right, and that the difference between them is due to the difference in the points of view from which they severally regard the question.

The gentleman from Texas says it is absurd that the people of the United States should not have the benefit of a larger appropriation than $11,000,000 for the improvement during the next fiscal year of the rivers and harbors of the United States; and he is right. The gentleman from Louisiana says that, as a matter of practical politics, if this bill were enlarged from $11,000,000 to $22,000,000 it would not pass the House or would be vetoed by the President; and he is probably right.

Mr. BLANCHARD. "Practical legislation" was my language.

Mr. ADAMS. "Practical legislation"—exactly. The inference I draw is that the mistake which the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Louisiana make is, that they do not regard this question from the right point of view. The gentleman from Texas, as I have before remarked, is right when he says that the people of this country would be glad to have appropriated a larger amount than $11,000,000; but he is wrong—if he will allow me to say so, he is "barking up the wrong tree"—when he satisfies himself with impeaching the judgment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. He ought to have impeached the entire system under which these river and harbor bills are reported year after year. If it be a fact, and I think there is no question about it, that the people of this country would gladly see appropriated a far larger amount than $11,000,000 or $12,000,000 or $15,000,000, why is it true that, as the gentleman from Louisiana says, as a question of practical politics, the committee do not dare to appropriate more than $11,000,000?

Mr. CRAIN. I said that I was opposed to the system; that I thought it wrong; but that it had become fixed in the policy of this Government and could only be corrected by public opinion asserting itself in opposition.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] still speaks of me as having referred to "practical politics." I said "practical legislation."

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, "practical legislation." I agree with the gentleman entirely that if I were a member of the River and Harbor Committee, I should feel that if I recommended an appropriation of that sum of money which I believed the people of this country desire to be expended, there would be great danger that the bill would fail here or in another part of the Capitol, or else would fail at the Executive Mansion. I agree with the gentleman entirely on that point. But what is the inference I draw from that circumstance? If it is true that the people of this country ought to have a larger amount of money appropriated than is appropriated by this bill, and if it is true that this committee under the present system can not as a matter of "practical legislation" appropriate a larger amount of money, what is the inference? The inference is that the system is wrong, and that we ought to have a new one. The error in the existing system results from this, that a river and harbor bill such as we try to pass every year contains not only a certain total sum of appropriations, but also provides specifically just how much money shall be spent during the fiscal year on every river and harbor, great or small, throughout the length and breadth of the United States.

Such a bill is very easily criticised by every first-class, second-class, third-class, and fourth-class newspaper from one end of the country to the other. Therefore it is that Congressmen hesitate to vote for the bill and the President hesitates to allow it to become a law unless the sum total carried by the bill is conspicuously small. How is it that the newspapers assail the bill? Here is a bill covering a vast extent of territory—covering a vast number of rivers and harbors in regard to the character of which not 10 per cent., not 1 per cent., of the people of this country have any practical information whatever. Therefore, when the bill passes carrying a large total, every little newspaper in the country can criticise its local Congressman for having voted for the bill, simply because it contains items for the improvement of rivers and harbors which in the section of the country from which that Congressman comes are utterly unknown—are not known even to be on the map, as my friend from Kansas suggests.

Therefore my inference is that we shall never get rid of the disadvantage of this system until we resort to another system, and we can never resort to another system until we cease to attempt the impossible task of having a committee of the House of Representatives act as a board of public works. That is exactly the function which the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, ever since I have been in Congress—in fact, ever since the river and harbor bill has been known in Congress—have tried to fill. It is impossible that they should fill it. What we ought to do is to provide for a board of public works, subject to the criticisms of this body, and let Congress, the source of appropriations, provide a gross sum to be apportioned by that board of public works according to their judgment for the next fiscal year to those rivers and those harbors which Congress has decided to be worthy of improvement. From year to year the action of that board could be subject to the minute and constant criticism of this House. We could apply every check, every safeguard, every restraint that would be necessary. Until we do adopt such a system the complaint of the gentleman from Texas will always be applicable to every river and harbor bill that can be reported to this House; in other words, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, anxious to pass its bill, will continue to take the estimates of the Engineer of the United States, and adopt a certain percentage of those estimates in order to get the total of the bill within the sum which they think Congressmen generally will be willing to vote for, and which they think the President will be willing to sign or allow to become a law without his signature. Until we adopt that plan nothing satisfactory can be accomplished.

Mr. WISE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WISE. How would you get a board of public works that would represent the interests of the various sections of the country as well as the Congress of the United States?

Mr. ADAMS. The reason why the Congress of the United States can not represent the interests of the various sections appears from the criticism of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], as well as from the remarks made by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Here is the fact: It is admitted that fifteen or twenty millions of dollars should be appropriated every year to carry out improvements already begun. That is a fact which the gentleman from Virginia can not deny or dispute. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, wisely, I think, from his point of view——

Mr. WISE. How would you have your board of works appointed?

Mr. ADAMS. Well, you have a Mississippi River Commission, for instance. You might have a commission or a board of public works for the whole country, or you might have a board for each section of the country. You might have one for all Atlantic and Gulf harbors, and another for the Pacific coast, and a third for all the harbors of the Northwestern lakes. The Secretary of War and his assistants might be the board for the whole country.

Mr. WISE. By whom appointed?

Mr. ADAMS. Appointed by Congress if you choose, or appointed by the President, as the Secretary of War is now.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Does the gentleman from Illinois say that he would have a commission for every improvement throughout the United States?

Mr. ADAMS. No, not for every harbor throughout the country, but a board for each distinctive section of the country, or I would have one board of public works for the whole country.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I understood the gentleman to say he would have a board of works for every particular improvement for every river or harbor.

Mr. ADAMS. That is not what I meant to say. What I wish to say is this: Congress is able to say for what rivers and what harbors appropriations shall be made, but it is for one of these boards to say when and how the money shall be distributed and expended.

For example, if Congress has decided that a certain river or harbor improvement estimated to cost $1,000,000 is a work of a national character and ought to be undertaken, it is unnecessary and absurd, in my judgment, for Congress to undertake the additional task of saying just how much of the money shall be expended on that particular improvement this year and how much the next year. That is largely a question of engineering. If Congress decides that we can afford to spend a total of $20,000,000 during the next fiscal year on all the river and harbor improvements of the United States it is a question of administration; it is a question for the board of public works or the Secretary of War to determine whether Harbor A or Harbor B should be pushed to completion during this year or should wait till next year.

By following the plan I suggest I am sure that we can complete the entire river and harbor system of the United States much sooner and much more economically than under the present system—if we can call it a system at all. My idea is simply this: The question how much money the people of the United States can afford to spend on river and harbor improvements during the next fiscal year is a question of legislation; it is a question for this House to settle. But the question how the money can be most economically and advantageously distributed during the next fiscal year among the various rivers and harbors of the country is a question of administration. It is a question for the board of public works or the Secretary of War. It is because Congress assumes to exercise the functions of a board of public works that we make so little progress in improving the rivers and harbors of the United States. I do not care to detain the committee further.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ROGERS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11765) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announcing the passage with amendments, in which concurrence was requested, of bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 10023) to authorize the Cairo and Tennessee Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Tennessee and Cumberland Rivers; and

A bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Association.

It also announced the passage of a bill (S. 3666) to amend an act entitled "An act granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across the Red River," approved May 21, 1888, in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices at San Francisco, Cal., asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as managers of such conference on its part Mr. STANFORD, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. VEST.

Mr. KILGORE moved that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced that the ayes had it.

Several members demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 27.

Tellers were called for but not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. LANE: A bill (H. R. 11868) granting a pension to Susanna Mitts, widow of James H. Mitts, deceased—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LEE (by request): A bill (H. R. 11869) to authorize the construction of a bridge by the Falls Church and Potomac River Railroad Company over the Potomac River—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 11870) to authorize the Falls Church and Potomac Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad over the Government lands in the State of Virginia and county of Alexandria—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. MONTGOMERY: A bill (H. R. 11871) for the relief of Hardin County, Kentucky—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NICHOLS: A bill (H. R. 11872) for the relief of Thomas D. Meares, administrator of Armand D. Young, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. O'DONNELL: A bill (H. R. 11873) for the relief of Nelson Green—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PIDCOCK: A bill (H. R. 11874) granting a pension to Margaret A. Burkett—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RYAN: A bill (H. R. 11875) to increase the pension of Edward W. Stephenson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11876) granting a pension to George Wolf—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SAYERS (by request): A bill (H. R. 11877) granting a pension to James D. Silman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. G. A. ANDERSON: Petition of the city council of Quincy, Ill., for an appropriation to improve the harbor at that place—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BINGHAM: Resolutions of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, for an appropriation for the support of the branch hydrographic offices at the principal seaports—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BLISS: Resolutions of the Maritime Association of New York, for an appropriation to support the branch hydrographic offices at the principal seaports of the country—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. BOUTELLE: Petition of citizens of Lubec, Me., for drawback upon tin-plates—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. T. H. B. BROWNE: Petition of Andrew Jackson and others, for increase of pay of crew on light-ship No. 45—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BURNETT: Petition of Kate B. Warren, widow of Charles E. Warren, late surgeon Ninety-seventh Regiment United States Colored Infantry, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYES: Petition of citizens of Iowa, for modification of the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. JOSEPH: Petition of citizens of San Miguel County, New Mexico, for the establishment of the Las Vegas land district in the Territory of New Mexico—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MATSON: Petition of John T. Polk and 40 others, citizens of Greenwood, Ind., for drawback on tin-plate—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NORWOOD: Papers in the claim of Allen Russell, of Albert Freeman and James M. Henderson, and of Andrew Flatley, of Chatham County, Georgia—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Resolutions of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, favoring Senate bill to incorporate the Nicaragua Canal Company—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, urging the passage of House bills 11027 and 11266, relating to pure lard and food—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. RUSK: Petition of Rebecca Allen, widow of John E. Allen, of United States ship Atlanta, for relief—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. YODER: Petition of J. N. Thomas, relating to the tariff—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The following petitions against the passage of the international copyright bill were received, and severally referred to the Committee on Patents:

By Mr. T. J. CAMPBELL: Of printers and others, of New York and Brooklyn.

By Mr. HATCH: Of S. P. Doran, of Wyaconda, Mo.

By Mr. SHIVELY: Of J. W. Siders, of Plymouth, Ind.

By Mr. SPINOLA: Of printers and others, of New York and Brooklyn.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 20, 1888.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. I notice that the Secretary, in reading the Journal, read the title of the bill reported by the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] as a bill to incorporate the American Historical Society. I wish the Secretary would be kind enough to see whether the bill is so journalized. The title is the American Historical Association.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The entry will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. EVARTS, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10323) to incorporate the American Historical Society, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HOAR. The bill is to incorporate the American Historical Association. The proper correction should be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be ascertained and the Journal entry made to correspond therewith. If there be no further motion to correct or amend the Journal, it will stand approved as read.

CERTIFICATES OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate communications from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 3, 1887, certified copies of the final ascertainment of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States appointed in the States of Connecticut, Kentucky, Oregon, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Delaware at the election held therein on the 6th day of November, 1888; which were ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying certificates, to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution adopted by the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, praying that increased appropriations be made for the preparation and publication of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of 3,228 citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the submission to the several States of a constitutional amendment which will prohibit the interference of any religious sect with the system of common public schools; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3747) for the relief of certain officers of the volunteer army, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3748) granting an increase of pension to Gottlieb Spitzer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3749) granting a pension to Orrin F. Waller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3750) granting an increase of pension to Charles Bowen; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

STATE OF THE SUFFRAGE.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer a resolution, to lie on the table for the present.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of thirteen Senators shall be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the state of the suffrage throughout the United States; and especially to investigate the elections for State officers at the State elections held in the month of April last in the States of Rhode Island and Louisiana, and the election for Presidential electors held in the month of November last in the States of New York and Indiana, and to report any and all facts showing whether or not any improper, undue, and unlawful influences and practices were exercised and employed through coalitions, conspiracies, trades, combinations, coercion, intimidation, corrupt use of money, purchase of votes or voters, false counting, false voting, stuffing ballot-boxes, bribery, or fraud, or in any manner whatever, or to what extent, together with such recommendations as they may deem expedient or necessary.

RETURN OF DIRECT TAX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there be none, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives in regard to the direct-tax bill may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is hardly worth while to read the amendments, as they are in print. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORRILL, and Mr. VANCE were appointed.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII by title.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill 9051.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the pending tariff bill and all amendments shall be finally disposed of upon the 21st day of January, 1889, and voting shall begin at 1 o'clock p. m., after which there shall be no further debate without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that upon the 21st day of January proximo, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, voting upon the pending bill and amendments shall commence, and that thereafter there shall be no debate except by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. VANCE. The Senate is so very thin that I suggest the request be postponed until the body is fuller. I do not think there are over eight or ten Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. MORRILL. I supposed that such action had been taken that the proposition would secure unanimous consent whether the Senate was full or not. However, I have no objection if the Senator insists upon delay.

Mr. VANCE. I make no objection myself. I merely made the suggestion with reference to the situation of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that a majority of each side of the Chamber will agree to the proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. There can be no objection to delaying action until the Senate is fuller, but I am quite satisfied there will be no objection upon this side of the Chamber to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to have this matter acted upon in order to call up the House resolution in relation to adjournment for the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection ——

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object, but I think it ought to be also understood that at the session of the 21st of January we shall have a final vote upon the bill before adjournment that day. I think that is important.

Mr. MORRILL. That is according to the proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose that is the understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is in the proposition.

Mr. HALE. Yes, that is in it.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it understood that the proposition shall comprehend the final vote upon the bill before adjournment on the 21st of January?

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. After the hour of 1 on that day there is to be no further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the pending bill, House bill 9051, and all amendments thereto, shall be finally disposed of on the 21st day of January proximo, that voting shall begin at 1 o'clock post meridiem, after which there shall be no further debate without unanimous consent. Is there objection to this proposition?

Mr. VANCE. May I ask one question, sir? Does that preclude the offering of amendments without debate after that hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. The order proposed is made if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. It is so ordered.

HOLIDAY RECESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I now call up the House concurrent resolution in relation to adjournment for the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 17, 1888.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Monday, January 7, 1889.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the resolution by making it read that the two Houses shall take a recess from December 22 to January 2.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the first part of the amendment he suggests is quite unnecessary. The resolution provides that the two Houses shall adjourn on the 21st, on Friday, so that a session on Friday will be held under the resolution as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. But we wish a session on Saturday.

Mr. MORRILL. We want to include Saturday.

Mr. HARRIS. Do you want a session on Saturday?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Then an amendment will be necessary to accomplish that object, if that be the object; but I had supposed that the adjournment would take place on Friday evening.

Mr. MORRILL. It is immaterial, if the Senator prefers that.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not a matter of any consequence, but I do not think I would amend the House resolution in that respect.

Mr. TELLER and others (to Mr. MORRILL). Let it go.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that if we reassemble on the 2d day of January those members of Congress who go to any considerable distance from this city can not possibly get back by that time if they remain at home until the 1st of January; and the general desire would be to spend the 1st day of January at home, I should think. It seems to me the 3d or 4th would be a better day. I simply make the suggestion; I do not propose to offer any objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I think we had better allow the reassembling to be on the 2d of January.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Vermont indicate the amendment he desires to have submitted to the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL. I propose that we adjourn from the 21st of December to January 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out "Monday, January 7," and insert "Wednesday, January 2;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Friday, December 21, 1888, they stand adjourned until Wednesday, January 2, 1889.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]?

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was concurred in.

PAY OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the revenue bill may be laid aside a moment that I may report from the Committee on Appropriations the joint resolution (H. Res. 236) to pay the officers, clerks, and employés of Congress their salary for December on December 20, 1888. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN IOWA AND NEBRASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has charge of the tariff bill, and the unanimous consent of the Senate, to pass a bridge bill, a House bill. It is important that it should pass before the holiday recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator indicate the bill by its Calendar number?

Mr. MANDERSON. Order of Business 1650.

Mr. ALLISON. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if his bill is likely to take any time?

Mr. MANDERSON. There will be no objection to it. A similar bill has been agreed upon by the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7776) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in the county of Monona, in the State of Iowa, and in the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-route.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In line 3 of section 8 a verbal correction will be made to change the word "year" to "years."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there committee amendments?

Mr. MANDERSON. There are none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 8 so as to make it read as follows:

This act shall be null and void if the construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within two years, completed within three years, and connected with completed railway lines for general transportation within the said period of three years from the date of the approval of this act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I presume there is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VEST, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. DOLPH were appointed.

THE REVENUE LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the substitute will be resumed at Schedule F.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SCHEDULE F.—TOBACCO, CIGARS, ETC.

226. Cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots of all kinds, $3.50 per pound; but paper cigars and cigarettes, including wrappers, shall be subject to the same duties as are herein imposed upon cigars.

227. Leaf-tobacco suitable for wrappers: If not stemmed, 75 cents per pound; if stemmed, $1 per pound: Provided, That if any portion of any tobacco imported in any package or in bulk shall be suitable for wrappers, the entire quantity of tobacco contained in such importation shall be dutiable; if not stemmed, at 75 cents per pound; if stemmed, at $1 per pound.

228. All other tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed, 20 cents per pound; if stemmed, 25 cents per pound.

Mr. PASCO. In line 916, paragraph 228, after the word "stemmed," where it occurs the second time, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

All other tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed, 20 cents per pound; if stemmed, 40 cents per pound.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, during the summer I presented a number of petitions from Key West, signed by many hundreds of her citizens, including a large number of industrious workingmen and laboring people there, asking that a larger difference be made between the duty on stemmed and unstemmed tobacco. I will read the heading of one of those petitions:

KEY WEST, FLA., February 27, 1888.

To the members of Congress of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, citizens of Key West, would respectfully petition the honorable Congress of the United States to increase the duty on stripped tobacco or tobacco-leaf without stems to 75 cents per pound. We ask this because the cigar manufacturers are importing stripped tobacco into the United States, thereby turning thousands of persons out of employment, as American labor can not compete with the pauper labor of Cuba; and for this we will ever pray the honorable members of Congress to take a proper action.

The proposed addition to that tax was based upon the former rate, which was 35 cents when not stemmed and 40 cents when stemmed. In order to carry out the purpose desired by these petitioners I have submitted the amendment so as to make the rate in the Senate substitute 40 cents a pound, which rate is the same as the existing law.

This matter has not received the consideration which I think it is worthy of at the hands of the committee who prepared the Senate bill. These petitions were referred to that committee and appear to have slumbered in the committee-room for months without receiving any attention whatever. When I inquired of the members of the subcommittee recently as to their action upon these petitions they had forgotten that they had ever been introduced and seemed unaware of their existence.

Nevertheless, this matter is an important one. The small difference between the duties upon the stemmed and unstemmed tobacco deprives many worthy and industrious people in Key West and other points in Florida and of the United States where this work has been done of this means of making a livelihood. The difference between stemmed and unstemmed tobacco being only 5 cents per pound, it pays as a matter of business to have it stripped in Cuba and sent in that condition to this country, and these people who have been making their living out of this employment are being deprived of their means of support.

I have recently seen in the newspapers that the attention of the tobacconists of New England has been called to this matter at their recent meeting held at Hartford, Conn., on the 15th of December, and they adopted a resolution tending in this same direction. The newspaper slip which gives an account of their action begins as follows:

NEW ENGLAND TOBACCONISTS—A SERIES OF RESOLUTIONS ON THE INTERNAL-REVENUE SYSTEM.

HARTFORD, CONN., December 15.

The annual meeting of the New England Tobacco Growers' Association was held in Unity Hall to-day with a good attendance. President Hubbard called the meeting to order, and introduced Alexander McDonald, of Lynchburgh, Va., the commissioner appointed by the Government on the tobacco exhibit of the Paris exhibition of 1889, who stated the character of the proposed exhibit, and urged some action on the part of the association. The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The resolution relating to this matter is in the following words:

Resolved, That in article 228, Schedule A, of the Senate revision of the House tariff bill, relating to "tobacco, cigars, etc.," stemmed tobacco be raised to 30 cents per pound, instead of 25 cents as therein at present stated, the reasons for said change being that in stemming tobacco, the proportionate loss in weight is fully one-third, and that if the unstemmed leaf is taxed 20 cents, in equity the stemmed leaf should be taxed 30 cents per pound.

The amendment I offer puts the rate of duty at 40 cents per pound instead of 30, as proposed in this resolution, but this rate of 40 cents is more nearly in harmony with the petitions sent to me, and from what some of the petitioners have written to me, I believe it to be more nearly in correspondence with the just proportion which should exist between these two classes of tobacco.

Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will be adopted. It retains the rate of duty now existing and which the House bill has left unchanged, and will give relief to a large number of working people by giving them employment. The result will be to cause the continuance of this industry in this country by these people who have been making a living out of it, without any serious loss to the revenues of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. PASCO. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be again stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 916, after the word "stemmed," where it occurs the second time, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "forty;" so as to make the paragraph read:

228. All other tobacco in leaf, unmanufactured and not stemmed, 20 cents per pound; if stemmed, 40 cents per pound.

Mr. PASCO. As the Senate is thin at the present time and there may not be a voting quorum present, I shall not ask that the yeas and nays be called now, but when the bill comes into the Senate I shall renew the amendment and call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays the Chair understands is withdrawn, and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. VEST. Has the paragraph of the bill in regard to cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading has proceeded as far as line 918, paragraph 229.

Mr. VEST. I wanted to call the attention of the committee to what I think is an inconsistency in the provision with regard to cigars and cheroots. I was otherwise engaged and not in the Senate when the paragraph was disposed of.

Under that provision the rate is changed from two dollars and a half a pound and 25 per cent. to three dollars and a half a pound, and that is a reduction of $273,097 on the importations of 1887.

By this change cigars that are worth $10 a thousand pay now a duty under the existing law of $2.50 a pound, or 25 per cent.; up to $40 they pay $3.50 a pound under this Senate bill, or an average of $52.50 a thousand. That is an increase of $12.50 a thousand. Now, whilst this is so, cigars costing $250 a thousand, which is the most expensive of the Havana importation, and which now pay $100 duty by the thousand, would pay $52.50 under the Senate bill, the same as the cheap cigar. That is a reduction of $47.50 a thousand. I hardly think the committee meant that. Of course all these cigars and cigarettes are luxuries; but even in fixing the duty upon luxuries we ought not to discriminate in favor of the higher-priced cigars, in favor of the wealthy and luxurious. Where one of these Havana cigars costing $250 a thousand and which now pay $100 duty is used there are millions of others used by the ordinary and common smokers of the country. I speak without any personal experience, for I do not use tobacco at all, I am very glad to say; but I think this is wrong.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Missouri is wrong in stating that this will reduce the duties. According to the Treasury Department's statement which he is looking at, it will increase the duties somewhat. The committee made a very careful examination of this provision upon the average of cigars imported, and they are satisfied that upon that average the rate is substantially the same as the existing rate.

Mr. VEST. If I am mistaken, I want to be corrected. What would be the duty under the substitute on these higher-priced cigars?

Mr. ALDRICH. There are very few cigars imported or made at that price.

Mr. VEST. There are such cigars.

Mr. ALDRICH. There may be some such in this country at that price, but not any Havana cigars in Havana at $250 a thousand, and I think the Senator will find himself mistaken if he has that idea.

Mr. VEST. I speak of the import price, that is, the valuation put upon them, and it is a notorious fact, whilst I have no individual knowledge on the subject, that there are cigars retailed at 50 cents, 75 cents, and even a dollar apiece.

Mr. ALDRICH. Those cigars are very rare in any country or any place.

Mr. VEST. In the city of New York, at Delmonico's, it is not at all extraordinary, but rather the usual thing, for New York gentlemen in moderate circumstances, and not at all considered as extravagantly wealthy, to purchase and use these cigars, and it is rather an evidence of an inferior social position for a man to pay 15 or 25 cents only for a cigar. I can not see from anything the Senator says that the same duty is not put upon these extravagantly high-priced cigars as upon the very cheapest that come in.

Mr. ALDRICH. The committee would have no objection to an amendment by the Senator to add 25 per cent. on all cigars valued at over $100 a thousand.

Mr. VEST. That would help the matter as a matter of course. If the committee will make that change it will be some satisfaction.

Mr. VANCE. It seems to me that the more serious objection to that paragraph is the enormous increase of duty. Under the first item, cigars and cheroots, the duty will be increased, according to the estimate of the Treasury Department, more than $270,000.

Mr. VEST. Two hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars.

Mr. VANCE. There is no call for additional protection in this case, and it is an article which does not appeal to popular sympathy in any way. It is not an article of necessity; and if we are going to reduce revenue at all, why slap on $273,000 right here in a case where it is not demanded by any public consideration whatever? If the paragraph has not so far passed by as not to permit of an amendment, I will offer an amendment now.

Mr. HISCOCK. The Senator need not have the slightest trouble in the world about its increasing the revenue. We assure him it will not.

Mr. VANCE. I only know by the estimates of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HISCOCK. The result will be that the cigars will be all made here, and our people will have the advantage of the manufacture here.

Mr. VANCE. I do not know but that I quite as much object to that, if the Senator supposes that it will decrease the importations and therefore decrease the revenue, because then the duty will be prohibitory.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is prohibitory in this respect, that our people with this discrimination in their favor can manufacture the cigars here.

Mr. VANCE. But that brings up the old question, how are we to support the Government if we place our duties so as to prohibit the coming of anything here to sell? I am as much opposed to the one extreme as the other, in fact a little more. I would rather err in the excess of importations than in the decrease of importations.

I will move to amend, if I may be permitted to do so, by striking out "$3.50 per pound," in lines 904 and 905, and inserting the provisions of the present law, "$2.50 a pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In paragraph 226, lines 904 and 905, it is proposed to strike out the words "$3.50 per pound" and insert in lieu thereof "$2.50 per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem;" so as to read:

Cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots of all kinds, $2.50 per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] or I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE].

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

Mr. DAVIS (when Mr. SABIN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I paired yesterday with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. I do not see him here, and I shall not vote unless my vote becomes necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. VANCE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a pair generally with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and therefore I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. BLAIR. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. CULLOM. He is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. BLAIR. I had agreed to transfer my pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] unless he has made a different arrangement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I inquire whether a quorum has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is not yet recorded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am authorized by my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] in that case to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER. For the purpose of making a quorum I will vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I was compelled to be absent from the Senate Chamber yesterday on committee work, and was paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], not now in his seat.

Mr. HAWLEY. He has arranged another pair, which has just been announced.

Mr. COCKRELL. He has arranged another pair for to-day?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who is detained from the Senate Chamber, and I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] that we can transfer pairs so that we may both vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MANDERSON. I therefore announce a pair between the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], and I will vote.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. My colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] has not voted. Does any one know whether he is paired? I have heard no pair announced.

Mr. FAULKNER. I transfer the pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. BLAIR. I can not learn from any one on either side of the Chamber that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] is paired, and as he has not voted, by the consent of the colleague of the Senator from Mississippi I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. That pair has been transferred to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], who is absent, which will enable the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Under the arrangement spoken of by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM. I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. FARWELL] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Payne,	Vest,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Ransom,	Walthall.
Blodgett,	Gibson,	Reagan,
Butler,	Harris,	Saulsbury,
Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Turpie,

NAYS—25.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Ingalls,	Spooner,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Stewart,
Blair,	Frye,	Morrill,	Stockbridge,
Chace,	Hale,	Paddock,	Teller.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Plumb,
Davis,	Hiscock,	Sawyer,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Sherman,

ABSENT—34.

Beck,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Blackburn,	Evarts,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Farwell,	Mitchell,	Stanford,
Brown,	George,	Morgan,	Vance,
Call,	Gorman,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Cameron,	Gray,	Pasco,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chandler,	Hampton,	Platt,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Hearst,	Pugh,
Daniel,	Jones of Nevada,	Quay,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to call the attention of the Senators who have the bill in charge to the provisions of paragraph 227, in relation to leaf-tobacco. It is a matter in which neither I nor my constituents have any particular interest; but if we are intending to reduce the revenue it seems to me that there is an unnecessary and unasked-for increase of duty upon leaf-tobacco used for wrappers. Under the present law the duty is 35 cents per pound, and it is required that eighty-five out of the one hundred leaves in the package shall be fit for wrappers. Under the provisions of this bill a single leaf in the bundle would condemn it all to the duty of 75 cents, as there is by estimation of the experts more than half or over eight millions of the entire fifteen millions of the imports of Sumatra leaf which is used for wrappers. It would therefore occasion an increase of duty in the great bulk of all the importations from 35 to 75 cents per pound, and although it is not estimated by the experts of the Treasury Department, yet it is, I presume, a fact, stated to me by experts and by importers of this article of tobacco, that it would increase the revenue from this one article over $2,000,000. I can see no use for that if it be so, but, as I said about cigars and cigarettes, it is a matter that appeals particularly to no public necessity. If the committee see proper to let it pass I shall offer no amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly it is the intention of the present law that all wrappers should pay 75 cents per pound. The intention of this provision is to make that certain, to prevent frauds and evasions.

Mr. VANCE. I would ask the Senator if he is not satisfied that it would work a very large increase of revenue.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am satisfied that the statement of the experts, so called, of the House of Representatives is very wide of the mark—not any way near the truth.

Mr. VANCE. I offer no amendment, but I call attention to the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will be resumed at paragraph 229.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

229. Tobacco stems, 15 cents per pound.

230. Tobacco, manufactured, of all descriptions, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act, 40 cents per pound.

231. Snuff and snuff flour, manufactured of tobacco, ground dry, or damp, and pickled, scented, or otherwise, of all descriptions, 50 cents per pound.

SCHEDULE G.—PROVISIONS, ETC.

232. Animals, live: Horses and mules, $20 per head.
233. Cattle, more than one year old, $5 per head.
234. Hogs, 50 cents per head.

Mr. VANCE. I move, in paragraph 232, to amend by striking out the words "$20 per head" and inserting "20 per cent. ad valorem."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated from the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 926 and 927 it is proposed to strike out "$20 per head" and insert "20 per cent. ad valorem;" so as to read:

232. Animals, live: Horses and mules, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. VANCE. That duty, like all specific duties, works an extreme hardship on the importer in that it taxes the worthless animal which may not exceed $20 in value as much as the finest animal that is worth $40,000. In addition to that, the increase in this item and in the item relative to animals imported for breeding purposes adds $839,000 to the revenue, for no purpose that I can see, to subserve the interest of nobody, and uselessly to incumber the Treasury still further by a bill by the provisions of which we are proposing to reduce the revenue.

Mr. REAGAN. In addition to what the Senator from North Carolina says, there is a practical bearing in this proposed change of the law which should be considered. A good many mules, jacks, jennets, and horses are introduced into this country from Mexico. They are brought in at a very cheap rate, some of them brought in for five, ten, and fifteen dollars a head. They are useful in the agricultural and planting parts of this country. A tax of $20 a head would entirely exclude from this country and take away from the various planting and other interests that resource for obtaining animals for the purpose of carrying on their business. I trust the Senator in charge of the bill will consent to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. It is not only increasing the revenue, but it absolutely prohibits the introduction into this country of the sort of animals I have mentioned, hundreds and thousands of which come into the United States annually.

Besides, as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, an animal worth $5 would be taxed $20 as well as one worth a thousand or five thousand dollars. So there is a want of justice and a want of equity in the provision as well as being opposed to a sound and proper policy and to the best interests of this country.

Mr. ALDRICH. The rate fixed in this item is the average rate upon the importations of horses and mules for the past two or three years, and will not substantially vary from the rate assessed or the revenue collected. Of course the increase of revenue to which the Senator from North Carolina alludes comes from the fact that we make animals imported for breeding purposes dutiable. The reason the committee have suggested that is that great frauds and evasions of the law have taken place, as nearly all animals are now imported "for breeding purposes."

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the total increase on live-stock, including horses, cattle, sheep, hogs, etc., is, as I have stated, $839,092, and an increase on the two items of horses alone for breeding and for other purposes is about $240,000, as near as I can come at it without making a calculation. It is not due alone to the changing of duties on animals used for breeding purposes.

Mr. HISCOCK. The statement that an increase of revenue will follow this provision is based on pure imagination. Now, we have a provision in the law which provides that animals may be imported for breeding purposes free of duty, and in the administration of that law there has always been great difficulty and great trouble. Thus large numbers of horses come in free which should not. Those who import such animals are entirely willing to have a specific duty of $20 a head. They are willing to have that the law rather than take the chances of administration under the present law.

Mr. HARRIS. It seems to me the vice of this provision of the bill is in the fact that there is a vast difference between the value of animals that are imported. I take it for granted that on the Canada line as well as on the line of Mexico there are more or less importations of animals, horses and mules, that are of very small value, while there are imported thoroughbreds of very great value. I have known of importations from Mexico of horses and mules the actual cost of which did not exceed ten or twelve dollars a head. I suppose there are importations to a limited extent from Canada of animals that are very cheap. There is one single man in my own State who every year or two imports one or more animals from England for which he pays from seven to ten thousand dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. Those animals come in free now.

Mr. HARRIS. Under existing law they do, but under the provisions of this bill they will pay $20 per head, just as the animal that costs $10 will pay $20 per head. Hence I think that the provision ought to be an ad valorem duty, so that the animal that is worth $10,000 will pay in proportion to value, as well as the animal that is worth $10 will pay in proportion to value.

Mr. ALDRICH. Looking at it purely for the development of the agricultural resources of this country, the agricultural interests of this country, I think the class of animals to which the Senator from Tennessee alluded last, the high-priced animals, ought to be brought here at a very nominal duty, if not free, while I am sure no interests will suffer by the exclusion from the country of the cheap, spavined animals which could be imported at a price of five or ten dollars apiece.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I would prefer to let the law stand as it is with regard to animals for breeding purposes; let them come in free; but if they are to be taxed at all, it seems to me the rule ought to be according to value rather than an arbitrary fixed rate of $20 a head. There is no justice in taxing the animal that is worth $10,000 the same amount that you tax the animal that is worth ten or fifteen dollars.

Mr. TELLER. The high-priced animals of which the Senator from Tennessee speaks have heretofore come into this country free of duty, and I have no doubt everybody will agree that that was a proper policy, because we want the high-priced, good-grade stock brought into this country for breeding purposes. Now, the Department, I understand, has found this difficulty, that all female horses and female cattle of all kinds that come into this country come in ostensibly for breeding purposes. We know very well that that is not true. They come across the border from Mexico and from Canada for the ordinary purposes of the farm and for draught purposes if they are horses; and yet if the party will make an affidavit that they come in for breeding purposes, they come in free.

In order to meet that and prevent fraud the committee seem to have concluded that every animal coming in should pay a duty. While it may bear hard upon the importer of inferior horses that the Senator says come from Mexico, it is not unfair to the man who brings in breeding animals, because the man who brings in high-priced, seven or eight or ten thousand dollar horses does a service to the country, and the man who brings in the inferior scrub stock from Mexico or elsewhere does an injury to the agricultural interests of this country. If this will exclude that class of horses and cattle from the United States it will be a great advantage to the stock-raising interests of this country.

Mr. VANCE. I can not see the force of the objection of the Senator from Colorado. Suppose female stock for breeding purposes may be brought in free, and that under that clause a number of cows, mares, etc., are brought in for ordinary uses of the people, for draught purposes and for the dairy, and so on, what harm does it do? Who has complained of it? Has there been any representation made by the farmers of this country that they do not want foreign cattle brought in? Does it do any damage to anybody but the industry of cattle-raising?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator wants an answer I will give him one now.

Mr. VANCE. I should be glad to get any information that the Senator can spare.

Mr. ALDRICH. There have been a great many representations made by farmers and others in favor of the provision which we have put in this bill.

Mr. VANCE. Whom do they represent?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is purely in behalf of the agricultural interest of the country that this suggestion is made.

Mr. VANCE. In what part of the country do they live?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think they live in North Carolina.

Mr. VANCE. I am very sure they do not. The farmers of North Carolina have more sense than that. I suppose they live right along the Canadian border, somewhere near where these representations come from. The great agricultural portions of this country that produce our stock, the plains of the West and Southwest, have made no complaint so far as I have heard. On the contrary, they are anxious to have any breeds of cattle that may improve their stock come into the country. There is no portion of the world that produces cattle cheaper than our country can. I should suppose, if I knew exactly where these complainants are located, that it would serve as an illustration of the general scheme of our legislation to which our statesmanship is directed of taxing the great mass of the people for the benefit of a few. A half-dozen men perhaps along the border of Canada, or somewhere there, have been interfered with in a cow trade by some Canadian cow that trespassed across the line, and it calls for exemplary action upon the part of the Congress of the United States, and grave Senators and Representatives in Congress are to devote their time in devising means for getting out this trespassing cow from Canada.

It is an injustice and an outrage to increase the duty on this item to the extent of over $800,000 when the Treasury is overflowing and when there is no complaint, for I assure the Senator that should all the cattle in the world be permitted to come in free, the cow industry will not die.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina that if he will inquire he will find this complaint on 3,000 miles of the northern boundary of this country, and he will find the complaint on every mile of the boundary between the United States and Mexico. Every cattle-man in the country knows there has been a fraud upon the Government and an injury to the cattle-raising interest of this country by the old system.

Mr. VANCE. That is just where I supposed it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. VANCE. We will have the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. With the consent of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], I have transferred the pair to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VANCE. I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] is absent without a pair, and I therefore transfer to him my general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], and vote.

Mr. BLAIR. I will transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PALMER. My colleague [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], I think, announced my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. If he desires to go on record on this question, he is at liberty now to vote. I shall vote "nay."

Mr. VANCE. Then I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:
